Israeli shuk comes to Toronto

Crowded tables piled high with hamsa keychains and challah covers. Merchants and buyers haggling over the price of a loaf of bread. People in a hurry, pushing and knocking into crates of oranges that topple over. Angry vendors swearing under their breath… No other place in Israel showcases Israeli culture more than the shuk, the Hebrew word for marketplace.

Olive Branch For Israel, a new non-profit organization that was founded by a group of 20-somethings to educate Canadians about the Israeli-Palestinian conflict, plans to bring the shuk to Toronto with a big party to launch its Web site later this month.

"We want to give people a snapshot of Israel," says Olive Branch president Grae Sibelman, 29. "We are trying to re-create a youthful Israeli cultural experience that people who would normally be going to Israel are not getting."

The Shuk in the Park event, to be held Sunday, July 28, from 2 p.m. to 9 p.m. at Suydam Park, was conceived as a way to raise awareness of Olive Branch while simultaneously raising money for Israel during these difficult times.

This event will bring vendors from Israel to sell products not usually available in Canada and will also include live entertainment. Among the performers will be an Israeli DJ, bellydancers and Cactus, a Toronto-based Israeli cover band. There will be a nargila café, a drumming circle and a variety of booths providing information on Israel programs. Israeli food will be sold.

Olive Branch For Israel's Web site, currently under construction, will contain data that counteracts inaccurate press, as well as reprinted articles from a variety of sources, including first-hand accounts of the experiences of individuals who have been to Israel in recent months.

Suydam Park is located at Spadina Road, between St. Clair and Eglinton avenues. Admission is free.

If you would like to help with the event or with Olive Branch's Web site, please contact Sibelman at president@olivebranch.org.

On Campus

In Israel, life does go on

By ALYSSA SCHWARTZ
Special to The CJN

The slogan may be "Now more than ever," but when it comes to actually visiting Israel, the more common attitude these days seems to be "Now's not the time." But that's exactly the reason I chose to participate in a recent solidarity mission to Israel, organized by Jewish Campus Services of Greater Toronto (JCS) and its GAP (graduates and professionals) program.

When I told people I was going, reaction was mixed. My parents were concerned for my safety. When I went to a popular lunch restaurant with my grandmother a couple of days before I left, the owner presented me with a baseball hat and said it was wonderful that I was going. But a lot of people thought I was crazy. My bosses wanted my cell phone number so I could report back on breaking news developments.

Like most North American Jews, watching the events of the past couple of years unfold on CNN and reading about them in the morning paper, I've felt horrified, scared and, more than anything else, helpless.

As a journalist, I felt something else, too – guilty. It's hard not to watch the often biased coverage and not feel some responsibility for my industry. Working mainly with non-Jews who have little or no context for understanding the current situation, I also feel a responsibility to be a spokesperson of sorts. People at work often ask me informally why suicide bombs affect me, even if the victims aren't people I know personally, or they ask for my opinion on Israel moving into the West Bank. Perhaps my answers make them understand a little bit more why the way we report on a story happening so far away can make a difference here. I'm sure it's hard for them to understand where I'm coming from.

Going on the mission gave me the opportunity to take a break from explaining (or maybe it gave me the opportunity to learn how to explain better) and to be with people who felt the same way as I do. During the opening program, we sat in a circle in the plaza by the Kotel and told the group our reasons for participating in the trip. For the most part, our reasons were the same. As we went around the circle, each individual told the group how helpless he or she felt back at home. We had come to express our support for Israel, and more than anything, our unconditional love.

The most moving part of the trip for me was the Israeli reaction to that.

Our Israeli medic, who sat and listened to us, told me after the discussion that she had no idea North Americans felt that way until that moment.

Our visit gave us an opportunity to share those feelings with a number of Israelis. In Jerusalem, where we stayed at the beginning of the trip, we spent most of our time in advocacy workshops, but at night we met informally with Israeli university students who were affiliated with the Jewish Agency. In Eilat, we volunteered on various Toronto-funded projects within the community. Among other things, we volunteered in foster homes and planted a garden from a pile of rocks at a home for people with psychiatric disorders. Though I've visited Israel many times and spent a year of university studying at Hebrew University, that work gave me a feeling of attachment to the Israeli people that I had never before experienced.

On the last day of the program, we visited an elementary school in Gilo. The students had spent weeks preparing dances and songs for us, and their cheers filled the school gym upon our arrival. One 11-year-old girl told our group that the wall of her apartment building had holes in it from mortar fire. She wasn't really afraid, she said, but then she turned to us and asked us why we weren't scared to come to Israel like other tourists.

Students cheered upon our arrival

The visit was filmed by local television crews and, because it coincided with Canadian Foreign Affairs Minister Bill Graham's visit to Israel, was even supposed to run on Global news at home that evening. It got bumped because of a suicide bomb in Petach Tikvah.

After the mission ended, I spent an extra week in Jerusalem and Tel Aviv with some of the people I'd met on the program. For me, this was when the real solidarity of our journey began.

During the trip, we were not able to explore the streets on our own because of the strict security promised to our parents by JCS. But after the trip, we wandered around Jerusalem and Tel Aviv, bought chocolate rugelach in Machane Yehuda – basically, we did all the things we'd promised our parents back home we wouldn't do. Being in those places, more than anything, gave us the most powerful sense that life does go on, and that despite everything, even now, "am Yisrael chai." Unfortunately, back home, we're exposed to the horrible things. But the most comforting part, the strength of spirit of the people living in Israel now, is something we don't hear enough about.

Belleville Jews optimistic about their future

By ADAM GRACHNIK
CJN Intern

BELLEVILLE, Ont. — Joe Burke, 74, was born and still lives here, but his two daughters have left. His longtime buddy, Abe Tobe, 86, who grew up in the house where the first minyan was held in 1905, has no kids. Eleanor Jourard arrived in 1951 and has four children who have all moved away.

After a century of Jewish life in Belleville, the community recently celebrated the bar mitzvah of the last remaining boy.

With the Jewish population decreasing and young people leaving, will this community survive?

"[The] demographics are changing. Fifty years ago these communites were a lot stronger. There used to be a lot more participation," said Michael Soberman, director of community development, Regional Jewish Communites of Ontario (RJCO), an organization that links 27 small Jewish communities together under the banner of United Israel Appeal (UIA). "It's a shame that down the road it will not be the same."

"Everyone wants to be educated [now]. Nobody wants to just come here and open up a store," said Tobe.

"[People] went away to school, [they] got jobs and careers elsewhere," said Jourard, offering her own explanation for why the membership of the Sons of Jacob Synangogue, Belleville's only shul, has dwindled to 30 members, from more than 75 at mid-century.

Belleville's Jewish community was once thriving. Before the arrival of Tobe's father, Moses Tobman, there were only a few Jews in the town, there wasn't a recognized community and no minyan had ever been held. Tobman left Minsk, Belarus (then part of the Russian empire), travelled through England and arrived in Kingston in 1905. His first job sent him to Belleville as a peddler bartering for chickens. After he met Abraham Safe, the two realized the need for a Jewish boarding house in the town.

Inspired, Tobman returned to Kingston, packed his belongings and moved to Belleville by horse and buggy. He rented a house, and in the months that followed, hosted the first minyan in his kitchen.

By the time of the Great Depression, the community had grown to more than 70 families.

"People came here to try to better themselves," said Burke, whose uncle Vova Vechter was the first Hebrew school teacher in Belleville. "The Jewish people always strived to make a good living, to not depend on any kind of welfare or public handouts."

Today, Burke is a healthy man who still owns and operates his own clothing store. He golfs and walks a few miles every morning.

He recalls growing up in a community that threw large Chanukah and Purim parties.

"It's a hard thing to imagine [what it's like] growing up in a small town compared to the strength of Jewish community behind you in the big city," Burke said. "It is difficult to explain what it is like to be an extreme minority here.

Abe Tobe (left) and Joe Burke on Tobe's property.

"My friends [the majority of whom, he said, were not Jewish] felt they had to segregate me. At that era, the Christians didn't know much about Jews. Their interpretation of a Jew was different then it is now. I had to work at being accepted," Burke said.

Despite the fact that the Jews kept to themselves, Burke said he has always felt comfortable in Belleville. Along with all the other children, he attended cheder (Hebrew school) every afternoon.

By the late 1940s, "most people became affluent and took off. [They took] families out to be receptive to Jewish life," he said, adding that people started going away to university and did not return.

"[People] got married and moved to the city. There wasn't the oppurtunity for doctors and lawyers here," added Tobe.

Regardless, most of the Jews who remained prospered. Many opened clothing stores and became merchants.

"[It was all] about hard work and brains," said Burke. He opened his first store when he was 20 years old and has since owned a variety of businesses, including a menswear store that he owned for more than 35 years.

"[You] take advantage of opportunities and have the courage to take gambles."

Tobe and his brother, Zeke, started the Tobe County Gardens and Frosty Freeze Fun Fair, which Tobe says featured the first soft ice-cream in Canada. There were also caged animals, concerts and events on his property. Tobe said many Jews began working for themselves, because "they wouldn't work on Shabbat."

In 1955, with enough capital and resources, the members of the synagogue came together to build Sons of Jacob's current home, moving the shul from its downtown location to a neighbourhood in the east end.

"For me it's very important, but it's a personal thing. If you are a Jew wandering around, it is going to make you feel good to see a shul staring at you," said Burke about the synagogue where he served as president on and off for the last 30 years.

"[The building of the shul was] very important to keep from being assimilated," said Tobe. "[We] always identified with being Jewish."

A Jewish life was extremely important to the community's families, Burke said.

"Intermarriages [were] frowned upon in highest order. Parents were always conscious to keep you in your own boundaries," said Burke.

Neither Tobe or his brother married, because, as Tobe said, "there were no Jewish girls around." Burke was 37 when he brought a Toronto native to Belleville and started a family.

Over the years, said the RJCO's Soberman, the Belleville Jewish community has built a strong relationship with the town's non-Jewish community, with Burke leading the way.

Burke teaches Judaism to a group of non-Jewish students at the synagogue. Recently, Catholics carrying a large cross across Canada in celebration of World Youth Day stopped in front of the shul in Belleville.

Understanding the importance of small towns, he approached the Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC) more than 25 years ago to ask for help in solving the diminishing population problems in Belleville. Yet, "they had a different vision then," he said, and wouldn't listen to him.

Times have since changed. Now the CJC works alongside the RJCO, attempting to strengthen the communities by offering such programs as a travelling rabbi service. As well, the RJCO has a seat on the UIA's board, which Burke said "gives us a really strong voice."

"The organization is the best thing that [could have] happened," said Burke. "This association saved the small towns. We work together; it is the best thing."

Yet as the community's average age continues to rise, young Jewish people in Belleville can be counted with just a few fingers.

Fred Cowen, 29, is among the youngest in town. The electrical engineer arrived in Belleville from Toronto on a work-term with Proctor & Gamble a year ago, after spending two years in Kobe, Japan.

"[It] is very easy for a person who lives in a small town to move out," said Cowen. "But it is very diffcult for a young person to move from a large town to a small town."

On June 16, the last bar-mitzvah boy and two girls, 10 and 11 years old, graduated from Sunday school. This year, these three students made up the entire class; at the middle of the last century, there were 40 students.

But Jourard, who along with her husband produces a community information bulletin called The Nudnik, said that new members have been added to the synagogue's membership list this year.

"We do have a few more members this year," she said. "Things seemed to have picked up. Like all the small towns we do what we can. Belleville seems to be doing better than some."

(Burke said in recent years the town's Jewish population has fluctuated between 25 and 30 members as new members replace members who have died.) The locals who built this warm and welcoming community are optimistic about its future.

"People from the city are starting to not want to live in large towns and in megacities, so they're coming to rural communities," said Tobe. "We have facilities for everything a Jewish person needs to maintain a Jewish life. [The] lifestyle is no different [in Belleville].

"As long as there is one Jew here, the community will survive," said Cowen. "It took until I lived in small communities to uncover my Judaism, who I was and where my roots were."

Canadian teens named 2002 Bronfman Fellows

Four Canadian high school students are among 26 North American Jewish teens named to receive 2002 Bronfman Youth Fellowships, which aim to develop future community leaders committed to Jewish unity.

The four are Talya Kagedan and Hannah Mayne of Ottawa, and Yonah Krakowsky and Talie Shalmon of Toronto.

This summer, they will spend five weeks in Israel with the Youth Fellowships program, launched 16 years ago by Edgar Bronfman, who was a longtime chair of the Seagram Company and is currently president of the World Jewish Congress and chair of the Samuel Bronfman Foundation, which sponsors the fellowships.

The 26 fellows — 13 girls and 13 boys — were chosen from 176 applicants.

Kagedan is in Grade 11 at Yitzhak Rabin High School, where she has served on the student council, is on the school senate, leads the women's prayer group and is on the basketball team.

Mayne is in Grade 11 at Lisgar Collegiate Institute, where she is a member of Lisgar Environmental Action Force, and is on the rowing team. She is a certified mashgiach with the Ottawa Vaad Hakashrut and tutors students in Jewish elementary schools.

Krakowsky is a Grade 11 student at Toronto's Yeshivat Or Chaim, where he plays for the varsity basketball team and was student council vice-president, head of the environmental board and a Model United Nations delegate.

Shalom is a visual arts major at Claude Watson School for the Arts, where she hosted a student radio show and was a member of the rugby team and a fashion show designer.

The 26 Bronfman Fellows will spend their time studying the history and traditions that bind Jews together worldwide. The program began July 8, after an orientation seminar in New York City, and will end Aug. 14.

In Israel, the youths will participate in seminars and dialogue with Bronfman Fellowship educational staff, as well as prominent political and literary figures, representing a broad spectrum of views on key political, social and religious issues facing world Jewry.

Each fellow also makes a commitment to do at least 40 hours of community service when returning home after the summer.

CMDA fighting loss of charitable status

Historically, CMDA has turned them over directly to Magen David Adom, which is a separate organization.

Drache thinks the decision on ownership will have far-reaching implications not only for groups raising money for Israel, but for all charities supporting overseas work, such as Christian groups that build hospitals or schools in Africa.

Established in 1931, Magen David Adom is Israel's equivalent of the Red Cross. It collects and dispenses blood to medical institutions and has more than 200 emergency first aid stations throughout Israel. It provides services on a non-sectarian basis.

CMDA has its national office in Montreal and a regional office in Toronto. It ships ambulances, medical equipment and other supplies to Israel, which Hersh said are bought in Canada, the United States and sometimes Europe.

Hersh said there appears to be a double standard at work in the tax department when it comes to which donations to the territories are deductible and which are not.

"Another judge asked if the Canadian Red Cross donated money to the territories, would its status be rescinded, and the answer was no. There seems to be a distinction on the basis of whether the money goes to the Palestinians or to Jewish settlers," Hersh said.

Hersh said CMDA has been under scrutiny by the CCRA since the late 1980s, but "tolerance" was shown until about two years ago.

CMDA's only recourse if it loses will be to ask the Supreme Court of Canada to hear an appeal.

Winnipeg Women's Campaign co-chairs named

By MYRON LOVE
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — At age 39, Beth Goldberg says being asked to co-chair this year's Combined Jewish Appeal Women's Campaign is a special honour that could only come to her in a smaller centre.

"In many other communities, I wouldn't have had this opportunity for many years," says Goldberg, the Winnipeg Jewish community's 1995 Max Nathanson Young Leadership Award winner. "There are not many people my age given the chance to take on these kinds of jobs."

Goldberg will co-chair the campaign with Mira Buchwald, who is co-chairing for the first time after being involved in the annual campaign for 40 years.

"I have filled many roles in the campaign over the years," Buchwald says, "but it never seemed to be the right time before for this position.

"This is the right time. I am grateful for the privilege of serving the community in this capacity."

Both Goldberg and Buchwald say they inherited their spirit of community service from their parents. Buchwald's father, Ralph Hamovich, was active for many years in leadership roles in the Jewish community, while Goldberg's parents, Sid and Hinda Ritter, have a history of working on CJA campaigns.

Goldberg began helping with the campaign while she was still in high school and has been a longtime board member.

"It seemed the right thing to do," she says. "And, once you get involved, you get hooked. I get a lot out of this myself."

Buchwald says this year's Women's Division campaign will focus on the Lion of Judah category – donations of $5,000 or more.

In a related development, the Jewish Federation of Winnipeg/CJA has announced its allocations for the coming year beginning in September.

As reported previously in The CJN, although last year's campaign raised 6.5 per cent more than the previous year, most of the $235,000 increase was earmarked for Israel or specific programs.

That left only $16,900 more than last year for 11 local beneficiary agencies. Of those, three are receiving more funding this year, while three others have had their funding reduced. (Funding for the other five will remain the same.)

The largest increase went to the Jewish Child and Family Service, which will see its allocation rise by $40,000 to $483,000, to help cover the increased costs as more Jewish immigrants come to Winnipeg.

The allocation to the Gwen Secter Creative Living seniors centre rose by $4,000 to $54,000 this year, while the Ohr HaTorah School, a relatively new day school, will receive $5,000 more, for a total of $15,000.

On the other hand, the Rady Jewish Community Centre will receive $25,000 less this year. It had asked for $29,000 more to help replace aging equipment and cover other costs related to increased membership.

L.A. airport gunman was Egyptian national

By ANAT CYGIELMAN and BENNY LANDAU
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — The man who opened fire at an El Al ticket desk at Los Angeles airport last Thursday and killed two people before being overpowered and shot to death was a 41-year-old Egyptian immigrant, the FBI said.

The man, armed with two guns and a knife, was identified by the FBI as Hesham Mohamed Hadayet. The man, believed to have been living in the United States since 1992, was not a U.S. citizen, but had a green card enabling him to work in the country.

FBI officials also said the gunman did not speak during the attack, contradicting earlier eyewitness reports that the gunman shouted "He took my job" during the shooting.

The FBI said Hadayet apparently was not connected to any terror groups and probably acted on his own.

The man, who also goes by the last name Ali, was a legal resident who worked as a limousine driver, FBI spokesperson Matt McLaughlin said. The motive remained uncertain and there was no evidence anyone else was involved, McLaughlin said

"We've never said it's not terrorism," McLaughlin said. "We can't rule that out, but there's nothing to indicate terrorism at this point."

The FBI spokesperson suggested that the attack might fall into the category of a hate crime and said the man was heavily armed.

Israeli officials said Thursday that the shooting was a terror attack, but the FBI maintained there was no reason to believe the incident was an act of terrorism.

FBI agents last Friday swooped in on an apartment complex in the southern California city of Irvine, after finding the suspect's car in a parking lot at the airport hours after the shooting.

They searched Hadayet's apartment, looking for his wife and two children, said Irvine police Lt. Sam Allevato. Neighbours told police the woman and children were in Egypt.

The two people killed at the attack at El Al's ticket counter at Los Angeles International Airport were identified as jewelry merchant Ya'akov Aminov, 47, and Israeli-born Vicky Chen, 25, who was working as a ticket agent at the El Al counter. Both were residents of Los Angeles.

Contrary to statements by Israeli officials, a senior FBI official said Friday the shooting was not an act of terror. "At this point we have no reason to believe this was an act of terrorism," Ron Iden, assistant director of the Los Angeles FBI office said.

In an interview with CNN, Transportation Minister Ephraim Sneh reiterated last Friday that the shooting was an apparent act of terror, saying it was a "logical assumption" that the incident was a terrorist attack.

"We are going to assume that it's a terror attack until proven otherwise," the minister told Israel Radio.

Foreign Minister Shimon Peres said Thursday that the terrorists deliberately chose the American holiday for their attack. He noted the swift reaction and the courage of the Israeli security agents on the scene and expressed confidence that Israeli and American security services would apprehend those behind the attack.

Israel's consul general in Los Angeles, Yuval Rotem, also said early Friday morning that the shooting appeared to be an act of terror.

The shooting happened with security on high alert around the United States for a possible terrorist attack on the Fourth of July holiday. It sent passengers ducking behind counters and hiding in airport offices.

A witness said " there were a lot of shots fired then silence and two more shots."

Another witness, Thad Weimlein, told CNN: "A lot of people thought it was fireworks and a prank... It was probably eight to 10 shots. People were hitting the floor."

One person was arrested, police said. The FBI, which is managing the investigation into the incident, said it was not looking for any other suspects.

The seven people wounded in the attack at the Tom Bradley international terminal received medical treatment on the scene before being evacuated to hospital. Two were El Al employees, the others were passengers, including a 61-year-old Canadian woman who had been shot in the ankle, CBC-TV reported.

Some 90 passengers were queuing at the ticket counter at the time of the shooting.

The flight – LY 106 – was due to fly to Tel Aviv with a stopover in Toronto. It was due to land in Israel at 4 P.M. last Friday.

The incident delayed El Al's departure frqm Toronto by almost 12 hours. With the airport closure in Los Angeles, all flights were grounded, said Rami Fischer, general manager of El Al Canada.

Israel-bound passengers were provided accommodations at an airport hotel in Toronto or were asked to return home until the flight departed for Israel. It had been scheduled to depart Toronto at 10:40 p.m. last Thursday. Instead it left Toronto at about 10:17 a.m. the following day.

El Al has been flying from Los Angeles to Tel Aviv via Toronto since last December.

New York police commissioner Ray Kelly told CNN that security around Jewish and Israeli facilities in New York was being stepped up in light of the shooting.

Israeli cabinet: no change in Law of Return

By ALUF BENN
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — The Israeli cabinet decided last week not to amend the Law of Return and to oppose a private member's bill that aimed to reduce the number of non-Jewish immigrants coming to Israel from the former Soviet Union.

The move effectively annuls a decision the previous week by the ministerial committee on legislation to back the bill, put forward by MK Michael Kleiner, the leader of the Herut party, to alter the law. The cabinet discussed the issue after Housing and Construction Minister Natan Sharansky appealed the panel's decision.

Under the Law of Return, the spouses of Jews, their children and their grandchildren are all entitled to immigrate to Israel, receive citizenship and various benefits, even if they are not considered Jews under Jewish law.

Under Kleiner's amendment, a person whose grandparent is Jewish would be eligible for rights provided by the Law of Return only if he immigrates to Israel together with the grandparent. In a situation in which the Jewish grandparent is dead, the grandchild would have to prove that he is persecuted because of his Jewish ancestry.

Interior Ministry data show that until the large immigration wave of the 1990s, the number of non-Jewish immigrants was marginal, but in recent years the number of non-Jews entering the country has increased due to the Law of Return. According to unofficial estimates, half of the people who immigrated to Israel in the past two years were not Jews.

Sharansky told cabinet that eliminating the "grandchild clause" would cut non-Jewish immigration by 6 per cent.

"In these times, when there is serious anti-Semitism in the world and Israel is in a state of war and is trying to increase immigration, we very much need the support of Diaspora Jewry and unity among us. Any change to the Law of Return will cause a divide, both among us, and between us and Diaspora Jewry," he said.

In the cabinet vote on Sharansky's petition, 13 ministers voted in favour, including Prime Minister Ariel Sharon. It was however left up to Sharansky, as the chairman of the Knesset Committee on Immigration and Absorption, to discuss the issue of conversions with the Chief Rabbinate and the Israel Defence Forces chaplain.

Kleiner said he was disappointed in the cabinet's ruling, calling it a political and lamentable decision.

Interior Minister Eli Yishai, a member of the Shas party, criticized the decision, saying the government "voted down the proposal out of cheap, populist interests."

Yishai said the Law of Return is out of date and contains elements that could endanger Israel's Jewish character.

He said he would continue his efforts to amend the legislation.

The religious factions, which had a majority on the ministerial committee, were in favour of the amendment.

Israeli doctors help two Arab 'bubble babies'

Now both sisters have been cured of their disease – Tassnem with a bone marrow stem cell transplant and Salsabil by gene therapy.

Salsabil's gene therapy was the "first in the world," says her doctor, who worked with a team of Israeli and Italian researchers from the San Raffaele Institute in Milan, Italy, to develop a procedure that can be used for every genetic disease caused by defective stem cells. Stem cells are "blank cells" that can develop into virtually any kind of cell in the human body.

The "elegance" of this particular scientific advancement is how it unfolded within one family, Slavin says. It is also a story of Jews and Muslims, Israelis and Arabs, looking beyond the immediate conflict and trusting one another.

The Abu Saids were childless for 10 years, and desperately wanted children. When they finally conceived Ahmed, their first-born, he died within weeks because he had SCID-ADA and lacked a functioning immune system.

When Hayam became pregnant again, the Abu Saids knew the disease was prevalent. As first cousins Hayam and Tahir's fathers are brothers, they had a "double dose" of this genetic disease, Slavin says. But as devout Muslims, they wouldn't undergo prenatal diagnosis to detect whether the baby carried the disease in utero.

When Tassnem was born with the disease, the current treatment was ADA replacement therapy, an extremely expensive treatment that attempts to rescue the immune system and is only effective for one or two days at a time.

A bone marrow transplant from a matching donor is the preferred option, replacing the abnormal stem cells – the building blocks for all human tissue – with normal stem cells to produce the missing enzyme.

Slavin used gene therapy to try and cure Tassnem of the condition. He took her own stem cells and introduced the adenosine draminase replacement gene into her stem cells. The experiment was successful, allowing the gene to persist in her body for more than a year. But Tassnem remained immune deficient because the number of cells treated were few and ineffective compared with the overwhelming number of unhealthy cells still in her body.

At that point, Slavin could not follow up with enzyme replacement therapy, an enzyme booster shot that causes slow relief to the condition and is prohibitively expensive. Tassnem was kept alive, but remained sick.

Hayam became pregnant again, refusing prenatal treatment. This time she gave birth to a healthy boy, Abdul Rahman, now 5, who was a successful stem cell match for his sister. Slavin took his bone marrow, isolated the stem cells, and transplanted them in Tassnem, successfully treating and curing her of the condition.

Another daughter, Yousra, was born without the condition. But a month and a half after Salsabil was born, Hayam developed a sore throat and cough, and Salsabil immediately began coughing.

Since she wasn't nursing the baby, Hayam knew that Salsabil was showing signs of the autoimmune deficiency.

Unlike Tassnem, Salsabil had no bone marrow match among her siblings' blood cells.

By the time Salsabil was seven months old, Slavin and his team of researchers had figured out how to give the genetically treated cells an advantage.

The Abu Saids were willing to give the treatment a shot, particularly given Slavin's straightforward, honest appraisal of the experimental procedure.

"Dr. Slavin said he would do the same procedure if it was his daughter," says Tahir, 38, balancing Salsabil on his knee while cautioning Yousra, 4, not to open up the slim laptop computer sitting on the table. "So I told him to make sure he did it like he would do for his own child."

Slavin not only followed through, but found funding to pay for the procedure. Tahir, who is a pastry chef by training, worked at Jerusalem's King David Hotel before being laid off several months ago.

But even with a regular salary, the Abu Saids, who live in a two-bedroom apartment in Ras Al-Amud, an Arab neighbourhood in eastern Jerusalem, couldn't afford the cost of the gene replacement therapy on their basic health insurance plan.

As an experimental treatment, the family didn't have to pay for the procedure, which was covered by Slavin's research grant.

Slavin's team had developed a protocol that would allow the genetically coerced cells to prevail in the patient's field of stem cells.

He purified the stem cells and mixed them with a defective virus that wasn't infectious but had the power to penetrate and infect the stem cells, introducing the adenosine draminase gene – the missing enzyme – into the nucleus and DNA of Salsabil's stem cells.

"It's like putting a computer chip into the body," Slavin says.

After a few days of sitting in a culture, the virus-enriched, genetically altered stem cells were put into Salsabil's body. Slavin also gave her a drug to suppress her sick cells and to allow the new, healthy cells to develop and multiply for several days before encountering competition from the sick cells.

The healthy stem cells began developing rapidly and within weeks, Salsabil went home, without any fever or antibiotics.

The proof that her immune system was working came when all the other children came down with chicken pox and Salsabil stayed healthy because her body developed antibodies to the illness.

Nearly a year and a half later, Salsabil is an active, healthy toddler who runs to keep up with her three older siblings. She also has a younger brother, Ahmed, a healthy, eight-month-old baby named for his older brother who died of the disease.

"They're all fine now," Hayam says.

'Feeling of destruction'

In other countries, the scattered remains of victims of large-scale tragedies are simply collected together and divided up arbitrarily for burial. Jewish law, however, requires that every person be buried complete. So Saul and his fellow volunteers, all haredim, painstakingly collect every last tissue remnant. These remnants then undergo forensic identification using DNA technology, so that each victim can be brought to burial with all his or her own tissues. It is vital to Saul that every fallen soldier have a proper grave, and every bereaved mother have a tombstone upon which to rest her head.

The work is very difficult, requiring tremendous thoroughness and emotional resources. It helps the volunteers to talk with family or cousellors about what they have seen. Some are affected to the point where they can't continue. Saul started out with ZKA, but to balance dealing with the dead, he found he needed to save lives as well. So he learned how to be a paramedic and drive an ambulance, as have most of his fellow ZKA volunteers.

"Since we are all haredi, people are surprised when we arrive and begin administering first aid, but they soon realize we know what we are doing," Saul says.

"The hardest situations are those involving children. Of course there are no easy situations, when life is snatched away so cruelly. Every terror attack is devastating. Every person killed, an entire world lost.

"We arrive at moments of hysteria and confusion, when the injured and dead are scattered round. We know these adults, soldiers or children were just out for a walk or a coffee. Just a few minutes earlier, they were healthy, laughing, talking and living confidently, not knowing what awaited them. Then suddenly, their lives and those of their families are overturned.

"I think about this as I do my work, saving lives and collecting the dead. Every life saved means so much to me, every death devastates. I try to keep a balance. I tell jokes in my fish store. People are so sad and depressed. A smile, a good word can lift spirits. We can't give in to national melancholy. After all, that's exactly what the terrorists want. We love our country. We live through every difficult hour. My father, the only one of his 12 siblings to survive the Holocaust, would always say, 'We'll stay here in spite of all those who want to destroy us.'

"This is our only country. We have nowhere else to go."

The Week in Israel

July 1

• Ben-Gurion Airport began using a computerized system for screening passenger luggage. Instead of being asked questions about their luggage, passenges will now hand over their luggage to be examined by machine.

July 2

• Some 40 rabbis from South Africa made a solidarity visit to Israel. "The purpose of the trip is to show our wholehearted support of Israel," said South Africa's chief rabbi, Cyril Harris. "We moved our annual rabbinical conference from Johannesburg to Jerusalem."

July 3

• The Israel Defence Forces (IDF) arrested an Islamic Jihad member who was planning to carry out a suicide bombing in Yatta, south of Hebron.

• Scientists at the Weizmann Institute of Science in Rehovot have developed a technique for overcoming witch weed, the enemy of corn plants, that could dramatically reduce hunger in Africa where most people live on corn and suffer from the weed disease. The Israeli team collaborated with researchers at the International Maize and Wheat Improvement Center in Mexico.

July 4

• Prime Minister Ariel Sharon said that Israel had accepted the blueprint outlined by U.S. President George W. Bush in his speech last week devoted to the Middle East. "Israel welcomes the principles outlined in Bush's speech and supports their implementation," Sharon said.

July 5

• The IDF is reconstituting the special operations unit in which soldiers disguised as Arabs operated in the Gaza Strip. The unit will consist of reservists who served in an undercover unit shut down in 1994 after the Oslo agreements were signed and the IDF withdrew from most of Gaza.

Reservist takes part in 'high risk raids'

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

For the two dozen men milling about a roadside cafe in the Arab Israeli village of Taybeh, May 10 was proving to be just another uneventful day. Unknown to them, however, nearby, a small group of Israeli paramilitary police was preparing to spring into action.

With their Uzi submachine guns set on semi-automatic, the four men drove up to the garage/cafe in an unmarked white civilian SUV with blacked-out windows. Before the SUV had fully stopped, the first of the four Israeli plain-clothes officers was out the door. He was quickly followed by the other members of the unit.

Doron Kay

With their firearms in plain sight, they strode purposely to their target, a wanted Israeli Arab who had been involved in a variety of criminal activities, including drug sales (that financed the intifadah) and weapons smuggling (to give the Palestinians arms).

With their own firepower unsheathed, the men moved quickly to their target. Before he knew what was happening, the Israelis had him cornered and were working to restrain him. Although he tried to run and in the scuffle that ensued, he bit his assailants, he was not able to draw his gun and open fire. His calls for help from his comrades in the cafe were ignored, as the prospect of a response from the very serious Uzi-toting officers proved ample deterrence.

As Doron Kay explained it, "we made sure they were not in a position to negotiate with us."

Kay was one of the Israeli soldiers who took part in that raid and who later received a commendation for bringing in the suspect without recourse to lethal gunplay.

Kay, 37, is back in Toronto now, no worse for wear, after six weeks of reserve duty with Israeli forces.

A native of Canada who grew up in Jerusalem, Kay returned to active duty 17 years after last serving in the Israel Defence Forces. Despite a lengthy period away from army khaki, Kay has been leading a life that could hardly be considered pedestrian or free of risk.

For a short time following his army stint, he studied criminology in New York, but that only whetted his appetite for the world of security, investigations and executive protection. For three years in the early 1990s, he was part of an Israeli team that was hired to provide security on board the Achille Lauro cruiseship, which had been attacked by PLO terrorists who murdered wheelchair-bound American tourist Leon Klinghoffer.

Kay circled the globe twice on board the luxury liner, travelling from the North Pole to Australia.

In 1998, he was granted a short-term contract to provide corporate security and threat analysis for Miami-based corporations. From Miami he returned to Toronto, where he and a partner founded Global Impact, a corporate intelligence and security business.

All the time, he maintained his "strategic alliances" with Israeli colleagues and his commitment to the Jewish state. When he heard of the Passover attack, "my heart overruled my head" and he made the trip to Israel, he said.

"I felt like it was time to go back and be with my country. It sounds tacky, but it's very true."

"For months, the tension had been unbearable. I'd spoken to my friends and for the first time, I'd heard the sound of the loss of hope."

His decision to return to active duty came in late March. Like thousands of other Jews, Kay was getting ready for a seder on the first night of Passover when he happened to turn on the TV news.

He was shocked by what he saw. The lead item originated in a devastated Netanya hotel where a Palestinian terrorist had walked into a crowded seder and detonated an explosives belt he was wearing, killing 29.

For Israel, it was the last straw, prompting a massive military response. For Kay, it too was the last straw, motivating him to put aside his life in Canada and quickly fly to Israel for reserve duty.

At first, Kay served in uniform with the Israeli Border Police – duty that included "high risk raids" on Palestinian terrorists' hideouts, manning highway checkpoints and arresting suspects.

The Border Police unit was stationed in an Israeli Arab village near the West Bank town of Tulkarem. Many infiltrators used the roads near Tulkarem and his unit was active in putting up "spontaneous road blocks," at which incoming vehicles would be stopped and searched.

It was a nerve-racking experience. "We arrested quite a few people," he said. Many were simply Arabs without proper documents trying to enter Israel for work. Others were more sinister.

"Every time I pull a car over, I know I'll confront one of two things. A carload of workers or the next suicide bomber," he said.

"This is not like being pulled over in a Ride Program (a Canadian anti-drunk-driving police check)," he said.

Terrorists don't wear identifying badges, so innocent Palestinians look the same as deadly ones, he said.

While manning a checkpoint, "you have to bring clarity to a situation very fast. You don't probe to see if these guys are nice or not."

"I tried to be polite," he said, starting every conversation with "good morning. But if there's a nanosecond of doubt, I take no chances. I can't."

In the new form of terrorist warfare being waged in the Mideast, "you confront your enemy face to face."

During his stint in the SUV, which came towards the end of his stint in the reserves, Kay's duties changed. The team was charged with responding quickly to intelligence leads about terrorist suspects. On one occasion, Kay's SUV squad served as backup when another unit swooped into a residential construction site in Netanya. Intelligence had learned that a wanted terrorist with forged Israeli ID was at work on the site.

"He was wanted after explosives components were found in his home and he had been guilty of shooting Israeli soldiers at a checkpoint," Kay said.

As his unit secured the perimeter the other squad rushed in and arrested the suspect, along with seven illegal laborers.

On another occasion, the unit took part in the arrest of a terrorist cell preparing for a bombing attack in a major mall near Tel Aviv.

There are numerous incidents just like these that don't get reported, he said.

On many occasions, among those caught up in the anti-terrorist net are men whose only crime is working illegally, and Kay is sympathetic to their plight. They're caught in a difficult situation, usually with large families to support, and they're merely looking for work, he said.

But at the same time, he has no qualms about arresting them.

"I don't feel guilty. I have a job to do. I'm not a social worker or a political analyst."

Israeli soldiers, he continued, "are not blind to the tragedy of human suffering. What we were doing was managing a situation. It was not the implementation of a peace situation."

"Israeli soldiers," he continued, abide by a strict moral and ethical code. Soldiers are repeatedly reminded that the rules of engagement mean they can resort to deadly force only as a last resort.

"We're a nation of warriors because of circumstances. We need to be excellent at what we do."

The high ranking officers he dealt with are "intelligent, motivated." Most are family men who would otherwise be earning degrees in the sciences or humanities.

"It's a human culture more than a military culture. But it's business when we need to do business."

After six weeks in Israel, Kay can see that many soldiers are burned out. Being on constant alert every day for months is exhausting, he said.

"The country as a whole, the soldiers are tired. It's a country that does not want to fight, but it has to. It's a country that would much rather see peace. Israelis would rather be shopping than for fathers to leave their families to go to miluim (reserve duty).

But, "Israel's enemy is not a peace-loving nation. It's an aggressive nation. It's a lot about ego and Arab macho. It does not nurture a healthy, functional culture that thinks towards the future or social progress, real freedom, democratization or thinking about social justice."

Israelis see themselves fighting for survival. Yet life goes on. People still go out but priorities have changed. Where a Canadian parent sending their children to summer camp might inquire about the programs available, Israeli parents want to know what kind of security the camp will provide, he said.

Back in Toronto, Kay is marvelling at the differences between life here and in Israel. Despite the stresses of the intifadah, Israelis are still much more open, more welcoming. Their doors are always open, and friends pop by unexpectedly.

Surveilling the parking lot outside the outdoor cafe where we're enjoying a cup of coffee, Kay points to the cars decked out with Toronto Maple Leaf flags, symbols of solidarity with the local hockey team. In Israel, cars sport the Star of David flag as a symbol of national pride in difficult times.

Even the simple act of enjoying breakfast is different.

In Canada, sitting at an outdoor cafe doesn't prompt a second thought. In Israel, he said, it's come to the point where even that is considered an act of bravery.

Arafat-run PA state: a terrorocracy

By MURRAY TEITEL

Guest Voice

The decision last month by U.S. President George W. Bush not to call for the establishment of an interim Palestinian state was highly commendable.

It would be a good idea to ask whether the creation of a Palestinian state at this time would, indeed, do anything to advance the cause of peace between Israel and the Palestinians.

A state whose raison d'être was to destroy Israel through terrorist acts would create more problems than it would solve. A Palestinian state would be entitled to act in the way sovereign states conduct themselves. Specifically, it would be able to import arms and set up weapons manufacturing facilities. It could import arms every day such as those seized on the Karine A, and no one would have the right to stop it. These arms would include rockets that it would fire at Israeli cities from the middle of densely populated Palestinian areas, making it impossible for Israel to retaliate in kind. This would eventually require Israel to invade the newly created "terrorocracy" on a scale far more massive than the recent incursion into the West Bank and this in turn could plunge the entire region into a war that would disrupt oil supplies to the West.

And no one should harbour the slightest illusion that this is not precisely the kind of state a newly emerged Palestine would be if created in the near future. Even if Palestinian Authority President Yasser Arafat were to be replaced with someone who was not personally a terrorist, it would not make any difference.

Since the establishment of the Palestinian Authority, children have been taught in school to hate Jews. Maps in their textbooks omit Israel. Sermons from a mosque have been broadcast every Friday demonizing Jews and calling for the destruction of Israel. These are the people who on Sept. 11 danced in the streets upon learning of the suicide attacks on the United States.

In the week following the attacks, a Palestinian polling organization, Jerusalem Media Communication Centre, found that 84.6 per cent of Palestinians living in Gaza, the West Bank and east Jerusalem supported terrorism against Israeli civilians.

People who commit suicide in order to kill Israeli civilians are glorified and have posters with their pictures plastered everywhere in reverence. Terrorism is to Palestinians what baseball is to Americans, what hockey is to Canadians and what pâté de foie gras is to the French. It is so much a part of their culture now that if they get their own state, a light bulb is not suddenly going to be turned on inside each Palestinian's head to change his or her way of thinking.

On the other hand, as long as Palestinians do not have a state of their own, they will continue to seethe with resentment and justify their terrorism on that basis. How can a Palestinian state come into being that will not be a terrorocracy devoted to Israel's destruction?

One idea comes from Sheikh professor Abdul Hadi Palazzi, a Muslim cleric who is the secretary general of the Italian Muslim Association. He abhors the way his religion has been perverted to justify terrorism and bigotry. When I told him about the results of the poll, he was not perturbed and said that if a poll had been conducted in Germany shortly after May 8, 1945 it would have revealed that 84.6 per cent of Germans were Nazis who felt Jewry had to be eradicated. Germans, after all, had been brainwashed to the same extent the Palestinians have. Yet, Germany soon became a true democracy.

What occurred in Germany, he pointed out, was an Allied-imposed process of de-Nazification that over a period of several years, restructured the country and put in power people who respected democratic institutions. Germans got on with their lives, and racism and genocide were replaced with worthy pursuits. Sheikh Palazzi thought the same thing would have to be done in order for the emergent Palestine not to become a state devoted to terror or what I call a terrorocracy.

I'd like to think this would be possible. Differences between Germans and Palestinians come to mind, however. Germans had a history of democracy. The Palestinians do not. Germany was culturally and geographically a part of a democratic western Europe. Palestine will, of course, be geographically proximate to democratic Israel, but culturally it will be in tune with the Arabs, among whom there are no democracies.

The Arab dictators like Hosni Mubarak, Bashar Assad and Crown Prince Abdullah will never condone the setting up of a democratic Palestine because by so doing, they would be sowing the seeds of their own destruction. Their own oppressed populations would soon be demanding the same. Moreover, peace between Palestine and Israel would in and of itself doom these dictatorships because they would no longer be able to deal with the discontent of their populations by channelling it towards hatred of "the Zionist entity" and nonsense about Jews using the blood of Muslims to bake special foods for Jewish holidays, as has been recently reported in government-controlled newspapers of Egypt and Saudi Arabia.

I therefore agree with Bush. He understands that creating a Palestine that will not be a terrorocracy will have to wait for some positive developments in the Arab world at large. While these will certainly be welcome, they will not happen soon. Until then, it would be foolish to rush to create a Palestinian state.

POLITICAL PROTESTERS DISRUPT NOA CONCERT

The popular Israeli singer Noa was rudely interrupted during a concert last month at the Barbican in London, the London Jewish Chronicle reports.

Eluding security guards, two anti-Israeli demonstrators jumped onto the stage, unfurled a Palestinian flag and hijacked the microphone from her. "This is a peaceful protest," one of them told the audience. "Noa has no right to perform here. Look what's happening to the Palestinian people."

Band members quickly came to the singer's rescue and handed the intruders over to the police, who later released them without laying charges.

Although upset, the 32-year-old singer continued her performance amid shouts of "We love you, Noa." She later told the Chronicle," I have been speaking for peace for a very long time. It was shocking that they protested against me indiscriminately because I am Israeli."

Audience members were also disgruntled by what one called "a disgraceful act which did nothing to further the Palestinian cause."

New Works from Harduf: Toronto linguist and biblical scholar David Mendel Harduf, whose many exegetical works and handy dictionaries of Hebrew-English and Yiddish-English are wellknown tools of study, has produced two new works of scholarly and literary interest.

Rabbinic Exegesis of Biblical Names and Narratives (in the Talmud and Midrash) is a sourcebook of the many names by which biblical personages are known in biblical and related literature. For example, as Harduf notes, Miriam is associated with 11 names, David with 13, Joseph with 17, and Moses with as many as 20. Harduf drew upon many talmudic and 44 midrashic sources, including ancient and rare manuscripts at the British Museum and Jews College, London.

He has also produced a work that should appeal to fans of Israeli writer S.Y. Agnon, the 1966 Nobel laureate for literature. Biblical and Midrashic Hebrew in the Writings of S.Y. Agnon is a 334-page study that includes photographs of Agnon's family and friends.

Look for both titles at local Jewish bookstores. Both are softcover and cost $25 apiece.

Tova at the Senator: "We're translating some great jazz standards into Yiddish – for instance, Nacht und Tag by Cole Porter – isn't it wonderful?" laughs Toronto-based songstress Theresa Tova of her upcoming dates at the top of the Senator, Toronto's premiere jazz club.

After a successful Lincoln Center Damrosch Park concert last summer, Tova has been concertizing a lot in New York this year; she performed recently for Gov. George Pataki, starred in a production at the Folksbiene Theatre, and is booked to appear at the New York Workmen's Circle soon. Her Senator appearances will be her first performances in Toronto in a year, she says.

The planned concerts combine "jazz and klez" and feature some wonderful Jewish American composers like Gershwin and Berlin, along with greats like Ellington and Porter. Among other rare treats, Tova and guest singer John Alcox plan to sing an Irving Berlin-Molly Picon duet. The concerts are called Tova on Top and are being recorded for a CD.

Indie musician rediscovers her Judaism

By JON WALDMAN
Special to The CJN

Ironically, it was a missed seder that lead independent music artist Ronley Teper to bring Judaica into her music.

Teper, 27, had accepted a booking on the night of a seder last year, thinking her fledgling career came first.

Ronley Teper

"At this point… I really feel that it's really necessary for me to take certain things that I can't pass up," says Teper, whose debut CD, Stories from the Tray, was released last fall.

But Teper wasn't completely comfortable with her decision and felt guilty about missing the seder, especially since her parents weren't too happy about it.

A couple hours before the show, with the seder in mind, Teper decided to incorporate her role as her family's youngest child into her performance.

"Right before the gig, I just sat down and wrote Mah Nishtanah, and it just came out instantly," she says.

"It was a different arrangement, but it really made me feel like I was at my parents' seder."

When Teper returned home and told her parents what she had done, they were overjoyed, she says. They were further pleased when Teper planned to include Jewish songs on her upcoming CD, as well as the set list for all her concerts.

Teper was born in South Africa, but moved to Toronto – "with my family and every other Jewish family from South Africa," she says with a laugh – when she was very young.

Music was an important part of the Teper household: her parents played Broadway show tunes and classical music all the time when Teper was growing up.

She attended public school, but went to Hebrew school at Beth Tikvah three times a week, where she recalls getting the inspiration for the Judaica she later included in her songs.

"The Jewish stuff was from when I was in Beth Tikvah after school. We used to sing from the siddur all the time."

When she moved on to high school, Teper became disillusioned with Judaism.

While at first she had many Jewish friends, when she found herself to be virtually friendless for a year, she blamed her lack of popularity on Judaism. She realizes now, however, that there were some Jewish people that she was upset with, "and that's totally different than being Jewish," she says.

"I just didn't understand the culture or anything. I was just rebelling, and I think it's totally normal to do that."

Teper rediscovered Judaism when she was at Concordia University, where she took a class that taught her about Jewish history (she also attended the University of Guelph, where she finished her BA in anthropology).

While she has not re-embraced the religious aspects of Judaism, she feels she now has a better understanding of her Jewish culture and heritage.

"It's not so much for me a religion, but more an ethnicity," she says.

"When I just say a word like kvetch, somebody's like, 'What's that?' Well, [I explain that] that's something that's part of my culture. It's a language that came from my culture. I don't even realize it so much as a religious thing, as more just my ethnicity.

"For me, that's the way I learned to celebrate being Jewish again."

Teper is currently promoting her independent album throughout Canada and the United States. She performed in Toronto last month and she will be in Ottawa and Montreal shortly. Check www.ronleyteper.com for more dates.

Performer enjoys clowning around

By ADAM GRACHNIK
CJN Intern

She travels the world telling tales of a world filled with jellybeans and chocolate carrots. She's ridiculously energetic, a little wacky, and full of laughs, but why wouldn't she be? She's been clowning around for more than 25 years.

Patricia Silver – known as Patty when she's in her clown costume – is co-founder and current president of Sphere Entertainment, a production company and talent agency. Her band, the Sphere Clown Band, is celebrating a quarter century of entertaining children across the globe.

The band performs an interactive family show filled with singing, dancing and educational messages about such things as sharing, safety and being polite. It has four records to its credit – its first, I Can Do Anything, was nominated for a Juno in 1984 for best children's album and its second, Sharing, went gold with sales of more than 50,000 copies. The band has also toured Asia three times.

"It's been exciting. We never envisioned this," Silver said from the living room of her Beaches-area home. "I did it because it was fun. [It's] nice to write our own stuff and all of the sudden [it got] enormous."

Silver has built quite a career since coming to Canada in 1971 from her childhood home in Missouri, after completing a master's degree in broadcasting at Bowling Green University in Ohio.

At first, she worked as a television producer, and then she worked for CBC as head of promotions for FM radio. On the side, she did some clown work and was involved in several rock bands before she helped start one called Sphere.

During Sphere's first national tour, the bandleader – knowing that Silver had done some previous clown work – asked her to do some matinee clown shows for kids. She never looked back.

Within months, the Sphere Clown Band was born. By 1983, Silver had submitted a demo tape to A&M records, and, much to her surprise, the band was signed.

Since then, her energy and love for children has propelled the band to the top of the industry.

"[It's] not enough to just put on a clown face. You have to do something that engages children in the performance. We have an enormous amount of energy. It's the frenetic energy that we put out," she said about her success.

"Little kids are the hardest to entertain. Kids are the most honest audience. They will literally get up and walk away if they don't like you. You have no choice other then to be 100 per cent," she added.

Silver attributes part of her success to the universal appeal of clowns.

"It doesn't matter where you are. The music is engaging and lively, the antics are universal," she said. "It doesn't take language to do it, kids will laugh at it anyway. They like the silliness – we have always been quite slapstick. Quite silly."

Silver said writing music that people enjoy is "very rewarding," and truly "a dream come true."

"It is thrilling to be appreciated for something that is close to your heart. The fact I can get up on stage and sing my own music and people clap [is great]," she said.

The Sphere Clown Band is also a family affair. When Silver travels and performs, her only child, John-Michael Erlendson, 17, is right beside her. He plays the character Peeper in the band.

"Kids love him. For me to be able to take my kid around the world [is great]. He has performed in all places. [It's been a] great education for him," she said.

With funding from the government- and broadcasting industry-sponsored Foundation to Assist Canadian Talent on Records (FACTOR), her band has been able to perform in Edinburgh, Scotland, as well as the Netherlands, China and Singapore.

The band has also represented Canada at various festivals as a guest of the Canadian government. For example, Silver and her bandmates just returned from Portugal, where they were invited by the Department of Foreign Affairs and International Trade to perform in the Canadian pavilion at the World Education Market.

Silver is also involved in other projects.

She keeps busy as head of Sphere Entertainment, which now represents 900 artists, and she is an active member of the Beach Hebrew Institute synagogue, where – fittingly – she leads the children's services during High Holy Days.

She said she has "always been involved in one way or another [with] Jewish tradition.

"I like the connection, the people and the heritage."

But a career as a cantor will have to wait, since the Sphere Clown Band is still going strong. The band is set to launch its fourth tour of Asia, and is scheduling a month-long visit to Australia.

Silver has also written a television series that she hopes to have produced in the near future.

"[I'm going] to keep going. Why not enjoy it? It's successful, it's in demand. This can go on forever," she said.

The Sphere Clown Band will be performing July 13 at Ontario Place as part of the Preschool Jamboree. For more information, visit www.SphereEntertainment.com.

Come Out Fighting: 761st

By DAVID SILVERBERG
Special to The CJN

Most World War II heroes who have been glamourized have been white, but a recent documentary praises a little-known battalion of black U.S. soldiers that liberated several concentration camps.

Fern Levitt's Come Out Fighting: The 761st, which was shown recently at Grant African Methodist Episcopal Church in Mississauga, tells the story of a segregated black tank unit called the 761st Battalion that fought valiantly on the field but faced enduring racism at home. With black-and-white archival footage and recreated events, Levitt's piece conveys the brutality of combat, the joy of liberty and the disgrace of war-era racism.

The first 20 minutes of the documentary describe the inequality black soldiers faced in the United States, from the sign-up offices to the training exercises. Segregation and racism forced black soldiers to labour positions while white officers held high-ranking positions.

As one veteran of the 761st remarks in the film, "We were wearing the same uniform and fighting for the same country. But we couldn't enjoy freedom."

When U.S. Gen. George S. Patton requested trained tankers, black soldiers enlisted in droves, and blacks trained in armoured warfare for the first time in history.

In London, white American soldiers spread rumours about the blacks to their British counterparts, saying the black fighters would eat British babies for sport.

But the 761st heeded Patton's bold words: "I don't care what colour you are, just kill every sonnuva bitch you see."

The documentary, produced by Barna-Alper Productions in association with History Television, shows events recounted by the veterans that are recreated so smoothly they look identical to archival footage. Several stories describe the bravery of soldiers, such as one man who dragged a wounded comrade 5,000 yards in snow to safety after his tank was disabled during the Battle of the Bulge.

Film recounts all-black unit's liberation of concentration camps

But the documentary's climax comes with the footage of the 761st entering Austria, and the battalion's discovery of concentration camps nestled in the forests. Holocaust survivor Max Eisen details his liberation.

A 15-year-old Hungarian prisoner of the work camp Ebensee, Eisen tells of his shock at seeing a tank roll into the compound.

"The black soldiers were horrified," he remembers, "and I'll never forget how big their eyes were."

Johnnie Stevens, one of the 761st veterans, recounted that the Jews looked skeletal and sickly. Concentration camp footage and disturbing visuals underline their pain and mistreatment.

The 761st, who had tasted a measure of equality in army ranks, where white and black soldiers fought as one legion, still faced racism in most neighbourhoods when they returned home.

But more than 20 years after the war ended, the soldiers of the 761st were recognized for their heroism and awarded the Presidential Unit Citation.

Hamilton-born Levitt is accustomed to filming forgotten heroes. She directed The Little Rock Nine, about black students who stood up to segregated schooling in Arkansas in 1957, and Each of Us Has A Name, a documentary that follows two Holocaust survivors who accompanied more than 300 Canadian students on the 1998 March of the Living.

Like Levitt's previous works, Come Out Fighting tells an important story that needs to be told. Whether its purpose is to profile a group of men who risked their lives for a system that demonized them or to remind the world about the horrors of Nazi Europe, a glimmer of hope peeks through the darkness. As Eisen says, "Without [the 761st], I would not be here to tell the story."

The film will air on History Television Monday, Dec. 23 at 9 p.m. as part of its "Turning Points in History" series.

Breast cancer centre reaches out to patients

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

For the past 22 years, Harriet Morton, the new chair of the patient and family advisory council (PFAC) at the Marvelle Koffler Breast Centre at Mount Sinai Hospital, has witnessed a sea change in the treatment of breast cancer patients.

Morton, who takes over from Jane Hogarth for a two-year term, was diagnosed with breast cancer in 1980 and again in 1982.

Since then, she says, she has seen a "drastic" change in people's attitude about the disease.

"Twenty-two years ago, we never said the word cancer; it was a secret that I kept from my parents and acquaintances. Only my children, my sister and my closest friends knew. I did not have a partner to tell me I was OK.

"[My situation] caused me to have low self-esteem and lack of confidence, and as the years went by, I pushed away relationships for fear of being discovered."

Harriet Morton

It was liberating, she said, to finally talk to someone who had experienced cancer. "It was like a volcano erupting the painful secret.

"Today it is different. We share experiences, we encourage each other, we have group discussions, and we support each other," Morton said.

When Marvelle Koffler, who sponsored the centre along with her husband Murray in 1995, asked Morton to join the PFAC, "I thought it was my chance to do some mentoring.

"I wanted to share what I had learned over the years. I did not want one woman to go through the pain of aloneness I had experienced," said Morton.

If the Marvelle Koffler Centre had been there for her, Morton said, "my experience with breast cancer would have been completely different. It would have been a different 20 years."

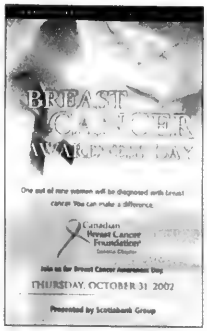
About 33,000 women come to the centre each year for diagnostic, surgical, medical oncology and psychosocial services.

The centre also offers workshops to help women living with cancer disguise the appearance-related side effects of chemotherapy and radiation treatments, and it runs the Astra Zeneca breast health centre, developed to encourage good health with an emphasis on breast health.

The Table of Plenty program, which offers yoga, reflexology, reiki, therapeutic touch and quilting, assists breast cancer patients with their personal recovery process.

"This program gives breast cancer patients an opportunity to be creative, and to remove themselves temporarily from their situation and make themselves feel good," said Morton.

The PFAC was initially created to reach out to patients and determine what would contribute to the success of the centre, she said.



"We now include a campaign to raise money for patients in financial need. It is difficult enough to cope with breast cancer, but when you also have financial stress, it does not help the healing, either physically or emotionally," said Morton.

Money is being raised through the sale of notepaper and pins created by Toronto artist Ian Leventhal.

The pins, inscribed with the words "Life is Beautiful - Handle with Care," are a tribute to Renee Steinberg, a former PFAC chair who died of breast cancer.

"I do believe this is the only fund-raising for breast cancer that does not go to research, but rather goes directly to a woman in need," Morton said.

"It gives her the opportunity to get a much-needed wig; pay for transportation to come and go for treatments; purchase medication she cannot ordinarily afford; and buy holiday gifts for her children."

With every pin and package of notepaper sold, she said, "we are reaching out and easing someone's life. It is an honour to do so.

"The PFAC reaches out to women – a grandmother, a mother, a daughter – and gives them the hope of continuing from generation to generation."

Orthodox, non-Orthodox see things differently: rabbi

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

Explaining Orthodox theology to the non-Orthodox is difficult because they have a different basic frame of reference, especially concerning the concept of divine revelation, says Rabbi Benjamin Hecht.

The director of Nishma, an international educational outreach program, spoke recently on the topic Explaining Orthodoxy to the Non-Orthodox. The lecture was the first in a three-part series called Orthodoxy in a Non-Orthodox World – Hijacking, Hypocrisy, Harmony and/or Holiness?

Rabbi Hecht used as an example a presentation he had given earlier to the First Narayever synagogue, a traditional egalitarian congregation in downtown Toronto that is embarking on a year-long study about dealing with homosexual members.

In particular, Rabbi Hecht said, the synagogue asked him to speak about the Orthodox view of issues arising from same sex couples, such as the question of their sponsoring a kiddush on the anniversary of their commitment and announcing such celebrations, and whether or not to allow "joining ceremonies."

The first issue to consider, Rabbi Hecht said, is why Jews perform a mitzvah. The Orthodox reason, he explained, is simply that the mitzvot are "edicts from God – a command from the King."

The intent of observing a mitzvah is to fulfil a command from God, he said, or according to the sages, one has not fulfilled His will.

However, he said, according to Maimonides, there are two kinds of commandments, those for which there is an obvious reason, and those for which there is not.

When there is an obvious reason, he said, it is "to develop an ethical concept that goes along with the commandment." For instance, people do not commit murder just because God says we shouldn't, but because we develop a feeling that murder is morally wrong.

A chok, a mitzvah for which there is no immediately obvious reason and does not cause "a moral repulsion" is a different story, he said.

Keeping kosher, for example, is a chok; one is "supposed to look at something treif, and say, 'Boy, that looks tasty,' but not eat it anyway."

However, even if one can sense the reason for a mitzvah, "ultimately, the fact that God gave the commandment is the fundamental reason to observe it."

And that is the basic problem, he said. "One can explain why something makes sense, but if the person doesn't believe in divine revelation, the mechanism [for explanation and observance] is lost."

On the other hand, he said, he would not be taken seriously "if I argue that the only reason that I am against supporting homosexual relationships is because God said no."

If he were a synagogue rabbi, he said, and a gay individual who wanted to join the shul approached him, "I would look at him the same way I would someone who doesn't keep Shabbat or kashrut."

When explaining Orthodox theology to the non-Orthodox, Rabbi Hecht said, if one uses their frame of reference, and ignores the belief that observance comes because of an edict of God, it is like "marketing Orthodoxy."

For instance, by saying that keeping Shabbat is good because it supports the family unit, that kashrut is an expression of Jewish identity, or that the laws of family purity increase the romanticism of the marital relationship – even though studies may show that these things are true – "you are creating parameters around the mitzvah to go along with [the non-Orthodox] frame of reference."

The classical Orthodox response to homosexuality is different from that of the fundamentalist religious world, he said, in that it recognizes and empathizes with the dilemma of a gay person. "You wouldn't try to 'sell' the Torah view that homosexuality is wrong. You say that this is the reality of your life; let's deal with it."

If one says flatly that homosexual relationships are forbidden, Rabbi Hecht said, one has maintained the Orthodox position, but at the same time made sure that the Orthodox approach is not even considered.

JWI/Toronto celebrates 50 years

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

Hilda Ronson has seen a lot of changes since she joined Toronto B'nai Brith Women's Auxiliary in 1945.

Most notably, she has watched the organization – now Jewish Women International/Toronto (JWI/T) – evolve from an auxiliary of Toronto B'nai Brith to an independent and flourishing community service organization.

Now, 50 years since the autonomous Women's Committee was established, Ronson, 83, said joining the organization was "life altering. It brought me together with friends, it taught me to be a leader; it got me out of my shell."

When she was a young bride, she said, she would go to meetings with her husband Lou, who has belonged to B'nai Brith for 63 years. "It has been an important part of our life and our marriage."

As a member of the Eglinton chapter, to which she still belongs, Ronson recalls sending old nylon stockings to Korea during the Korean War, going to Sunnybrook Hospital to play bingo with the veterans, and serving tea on silver trays to new citizens during a citizenship ceremony at City Hall.

"We had a project a month. We were very proud to receive the Sidney Kusworm Citizen Award for civic affairs, out of 240 chapters in eastern Canada and the United States."

At JWI/T's recent 50th annual council installation which saw Charlotte Lefler installed as president, Lucille Bensky, who has been a JWI/T member since 1958 and has collected memorabilia that she plans to donate to JWI's archives, gave a retrospective of the organization.

Benksy, who has been both Toronto and national president, said that in the early postwar years, members focused their efforts on aid to Israel and Europe by sending weekly parcels of food, blankets and clothes.

"Closer to home, the members visited military hospitals so our boys knew they were not forgotten."

The more things changed over the years, however, the more they remained the same, Bensky said. "In 1949 our members were knitting socks for refugees; in '59 we knit sweaters for Korean orphans; now we knit mittens for inner-city children.

"In the late '40s, we worked with Jewish Immigrant Aid Services and Canadian Jewish Congress to find homes for new Canadians and help them adjust to a new life. Currently, we are proud of Toronto volunteers who work with clients at our ASTEH apartment for abused women and their families."

In the field of health, Bensky said, JWI/T "had been an initiator, leading the way in developing community projects.

"In conjunction with public health nurses, we began a visual screening test for kindergarten children, and trained our volunteers to use ophthalmology equipment to test seniors for glaucoma.

"Tay Sachs, an unheard of disease prior to 1971, has almost been eradicated in Toronto thanks to the dedicated efforts of JWI/T in three city-wide screening programs organized in 1971, 1986 and 1997. The initial screening format became the model for the world," said Bensky.

Throughout the war years, she said, JWI chapters participated in Red Cross blood banks, and in 1959, the Toronto chapter held its first clinic.

"The newly formed Canadian Blood Services has recognized the important role we are playing in their blood donor clinics. Communal drives over the last five decades have always received our membership's support."

Along with the 1943 founding of the Children's Home in Israel and the opening of the Canada Group Home in 1971, Bensky said, "our members have generously supported the Residential Treatment Centre in Israel through the purchase of donation cards and fund-raising projects."

Ronson said that over the years, she has witnessed more and more women entering the workforce. "When I joined, we were all at home; we had lots of time to volunteer. Now, it's much more of a challenge. Women have lots more on their plates and they have to pick their volunteer time wisely.

"I encourage women to join, though; it is worth the effort it takes. Women can help the community, make lifelong friends and develop new skills. It is enriching."

Teenage golfer named to Canadian junior team

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

David Albert is a tall, lanky kid, the kind of guy for whom the physics of golf can become a virtual 15th club in his bag.

With his range and reach – along with the suppleness of youth – he can make the the arc on his swing as wide as a windmill, and as a result, generate plenty of clubhead speed at impact. The results are evident 260 to 280 yards down range, which is where the 15-year-old's tee shots usually end up.

Albert rode a strong first shot coupled with good putting skills to a much-coveted position on the national junior team that will represent Canada in a Ryder Cup-style match in Bermuda later this month.

Albert shot rounds of 76 and 76 at the 6,450-yard par 70 North Course at the Station Creek Golf Club in Stouffville to finish second, two strokes behind the top 15-year-old, to qualify for the Canadian team.

The second-place finish, though somewhat disappointing for Albert, is nevertheless a big improvement over last year, when his game was more erratic and his concentration less focused.

"I guess I'm playing better and working harder at it," Albert said. "This year, I'm practising more and staying focused more. I care a lot more this year how I do. I'm setting my mind to what I want to do and doing what I have to do to achieve my goals."

Albert's first round at Station Creek placed him in the final group on the second and last day of competition. At the 11th hole in the last round, he found himself tied with two other youngsters. That's when the reality of the situation really hit home.

"We were all tied and I started to get nervous," he said.

In the last few holes, Albert's driving game continued to be strong, but he hit two poor approach shots, missed the greens and didn't get up and down. He gave away two strokes to the eventual winner, who was steady, earning pars all the way through. The third competitor had a rough finish, suffering several disastrous holes that put him out of the running.

When Albert's scores held up to a challenge from golfers in Quebec playing in a parallel qualifying tournament, his place on the Canadian team – and a second-place national ranking for 15-year-olds – was assured.

He's looking forward to the tournament in Bermuda. "I'm just going there to have fun. I'm going to try my best to win. It's not the end of the world if I don't. I'm going more for the experience."

In the meantime, Albert is spending about 11 hours a day at the Oakdale Golf and Country Club, where his family are members, usually playing twice a day as well as practising.

His shot off the tee is pretty strong and he's pretty happy with his putting. "My approach is what I have to work on. Too many times I put myself in a good position and throw it away."

At his age, Albert's got lots of time to correct the flaws in his game. Considering that a couple of years ago he was shooting in the mid-80s and now he's consistently in the mid-70s, he seems to be making good progress.

Albert began playing golf, or at least striking the ball, when he was five, when his dad, Michael, introduced him to the game at a driving range.

He enjoyed whacking balls right from the start and a few years later, his competitive juices began to get really cranked up.

"I liked it and I wanted to play more competitively so I'd see how I ranked against other juniors," he said.

Last year he entered several regional tournaments, winning an invitational event at Oliver's Nest in Lindsay. Overall, however, he wasn't very happy with his performances in 2001 although as a member of Toronto's Maccabi team, he won a silver medal at the junior games in Philadelphia.

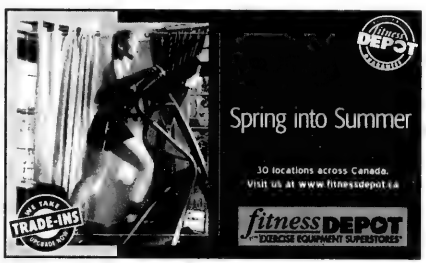
David Albert

With coach Mark Hanna's help he worked on the technical aspects of his game and improved considerably. In mid-May he tied for 15th at the Team Canada qualifier for the junior world tournament in San Diego, shooting rounds of 83 and 81 at King's Forest Golf Course in Hamilton.

A week later, he finished fifth at the Canadian Junior Golf Association (CJGA) Classic at the Maples of Ballantrae Lodge and Country Club, with rounds of 88 and 75.

A week after that came his breakthrough performance at Station Creek.

Albert's still got three years of high school ahead of him, but he's already planning his golfing future. His dream is to earn a scholarship to a big U.S. school and continue his development south of the border.



Pakistani tennis star threatened with sanctions for partnering with Israeli

CJN News Services

LONDON — Pakistan's Aisam Ul-Haq Qureshi, who partnered Amir Hadad into the third round of the men's doubles at Wimbledon, faces a ban for teaming up with the Israeli player.

Qureshi's decision to partner with Hadad was officially condemned by Pakistan Sports Board (PSB) director Brig.-Gen. Saulat Abbas, who said the player could face sanctions.

The BBC Web site quoted Abbas as saying that, "Since Pakistan has no links with Israel, Qureshi may face a ban."

"Although he is playing in his private capacity," added Abbas, "we officially condemn his playing with an Israeli player and an explanation has been sought from him."

Hadad and Qureshi advanced to the the third round of the men's doubles at Wimbledon, with a convincing 6-4, 6-4, 6-4 straight-sets victory over tournament 11th seeds Ellis Ferreira of South Africa and American Rick Leach. However, in the third round, the Czech duo of Martin Damm and Cyril Suk – the seventh seeds – defeated them 6-1, 7-6, 6-4.

According to Hadad, the on-court partnership that has been grabbing headlines was formed when the two players hooked up for a practice session, hit it off and decided to play the Wimbledon qualifying doubles together.

Qureshi, 22, has been Pakistan's best player for the last two years, playing a key role in the country's recent Davis Cup semifinal win over Taiwan in the Asia Oceania group 11.

"I didn't even think about Qureshi being a Muslim until I went home and found it was big news in Israel, that a Jew was playing with a Muslim," Hadad said. "I just thought of him as a human being."

Pakistan's minister of sport, S.K. Tressler, said "the government will definitely approach this issue. As we don't have diplomatic relations with Israel, we don't recognize it.

"But it would be premature to say what we can do. All I can say is that Aisam's decision to play with an Israeli was not morally correct."

Qureshi himself brushed aside the criticism. "I am surprised at the fuss being made over my partnership," he said. "I would like to be talked about for my tennis rather than politics. If we can change people's minds, then that would be a good thing.

For his part, Hadad said each Wimbledon win was "dedicated to peace in the world. This is sport, not politics, and people can get along. It's crazy. All the killing is for nothing.

FICTION AND POETRY

• The Ascent of Eli Israel and Other Stories, by Jon Papernick Arcade Publishing, $36.50, HC.

These shocking short stories set in present-day Israel capture the mood of the country and the various cultures of a fascinating region. This anthology is the first published book of a young, talented storyteller in the league of Nathan Englander.

• The Ivory Pomegranate, by Adora Freedman, Gefen Publishing House, $29.50, SC.

The typically complicated North American Jewish characters searching for truth and meaning in this intriguing novel include a rabbi who becomes romantically involved with a prisoner and an absent mother, completely estranged from her Jewish heritage, who falls in love with an observant Jew and former cult member.

• American Standard and Other Poems, by Joseph Sherman, Oberon Press, $13.95, SC.

In this collection, the author "returns to what he calls life's miscellany... Sherman's work is very polished and no word is ever wasted."

• Editors: The Best From Five Decades, by Saul Bellow and Keith Botsford, Toby Press, $49.95, SC

A stunning collection of essays, stories and poems (fiction and non-fiction) chosen by two of this generation's finest writers, spanning a 50-year journalistic collaboration. A literary treasure.

NON-FICTION

• The Rav Speaks: Five Addresses on Israel, History, and the Jewish People, by Rabbi Joseph B. Soloveitchik, Toras HoRav Foundation, $33.95, HC.

These five lectures were originally delivered by the late, great leader of modern Orthodoxy between 1962 and 1967. According to Rabbi David Telsner, who published the talks in Hebrew in 1973, although "many a significant change has taken place in the 'dramatis personae', the essentials of the 'drama' itself have remained constant."

• Scattered Among the Peoples: The Jewish Diaspora in Ten Portraits, by Allan Levine, McClelland $ Stewart, $36.99, HC.

A wonderful celebration of Jewish survival, focusing on the lives of important, remarkable individuals in major cosmopolitan centres during significant periods of Jewish history.

• Oslo's Gift of "Peace": The Destruction of Israel's Security, by Christopher Barder, ACPR Publishers, $19.95, SC.

This thorough analysis of the dangerous so-called peace process is a must-read for anyone attempting to understand the current situation in the Middle East.

Recommended Reading

• Not a Simple Story: Love and Politics in a Modern Hebrew Novel, by Sharon M. Green, Lexington Books, $46.95, SC.

This critique of A Simple Story, the famous novel by literary giant S.Y. Agnon, argues that the author "seeks not to demean Jews but to hold them to a higher standard. By demonstrating all that Jewish society lacks, Agnon implicitly shows what it needs for it to thrive."

YOUTH

• Rafi's Search for the Torah Munching Monster, written and illustrated by Rabbi Steven Mills, Alef Design Group, $16.95, SC.

"The clues point to only one thing. The Torah has been stolen by the Terrible Torah Munching Monster!" An adorable detective story for young children.

Ages 7 and up

• Too Young for Yiddish, by Richard Michelson, Talewinds, $25.95, HC.

The importance of preserving family history is the lesson in this touching story about a young man, deeply attached to his grandfather, who discovers that one can never be too young or too old to learn Yiddish. Wonderful illustrations by Neil Waldman.

• One Small Dog, by Johanna Hurwitz, HarperCollins, $7.50, SC.

A heartwarming story about a small boy who must give up his beloved pet. Lovely illustrations by Diane deGroat.

California Grilled Veggie Sandwich

1 loaf focaccia bread
1/4 cup mayonnaise
3 cloves garlic, minced
1 tblsp. lemon juice
1 ea. small zucchini, yellow & green sliced
1 red onion, sliced
1 cup sliced red bell peppers
1/2 cup crumbled feta cheese
1/8 cup olive oil

In small bowl, combine mayonnaise, minced garlic, lemon juice. Set sauce aside in refrigerator.

Brush vegetables with olive oil on each sided. Grill pepper, zucchini, onion and squash for 3 mins. turning, and cook for another 3 mins. on BBQ vegetable grill. Remove from grill and set aside.

While vegetables are cooking, cut focaccia into 4 slices. Spread sauce evenly over top, sprinkle with feta cheese. Place on grill, cover with lid for 2-3 mins. Watch carefully so bottom doesn't burn. This will warm bread, and slightly melt cheese. Remove from grill, and layer 2 pieces with vegetables. Cover with remaining bread. Serve warm.

DearKarilani

About Teens

I am in high school and have been dating a boy in my grade who is nice, good looking and fun to be with. He always treats me really well and I like him a lot. The problem is that he is a terrible student and doesn't seem to care about school. Unlike me, he often skips class, rarely studies or does any homework, and he hangs around with a group of guys who don't take schoolwork or university admissions seriously. It's hard for me to maintain the kind of concentration I need to get good grades when I spend time with him. I feel like his attitude toward school is contagious. Should we break up?

Confused

Dear Confused,

I ran this story by my parents, grandparents and my Uncle Syd who is in the appliance business, and they all answered this question with another question: What does your boyfriend's father do for a living?

Seriously, though, you have to have a talk with this guy. It's good to hear that he treats you well when you are together, but there's more to a relationship than just having fun. True friends also support each other in achieving their goals. If he can't manage to turn around his own performance in school, you should at least let him know that his negative attitude is having an effect on you and that he should try to be sensitive to your priorities in life.

If he cares about you enough, he may start to read and get interested in the same things that you are interested in, and you may end up being a major influence on him rather than the other way around.

Also, my family members do have something of a point. How will your boyfriend find a career and support himself once high school is over? One day his approach to school may come back to haunt him. Some people do get serious about their education at a later stage of life and manage to go back to school and improve their job prospects, but that can be a long and difficult process. Or he might find himself in a successful career that doesn't require a formal education.

But if you feel committed to school, don't let yourself get influenced by his habits. The time for you to concentrate on your education is now.

Dear Karilani is written on a rotating basis by three high school students. The drawing is a composite. We welcome questions from our readers. Please mail, e-mail or fax them to The CJN.

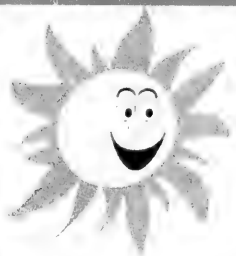
MOUNT SINAI HOSPITAL

The Best Medicine

YOUR HOSPITAL, YOUR NEWS



Healthy tips for a summer of fun in the sun!

You are lying on the beach enjoying a warm, summer breeze. As the sun beats down on your face and you sift the hot sand through your toes, you feel relaxed and think of the wonderful healthy glow you are acquiring. But is it really so healthy? Dr. Jeff Bloom, Family Physician-in-Chief at Mount Sinai Hospital answers some frequently asked, burning summer questions.

What are the long-term risks associated with sun exposure?

Some of the long-term risks include skin cancers, non-malignant skin diseases and pre-mature aging. Repeated overexposure to the sun can weaken the elasticity of your skin and cause the outer layer to thicken, become leathery and develop wrinkles. In more severe cases of overexposure to the sun, you can develop certain types of skin cancer such as Melanoma.

Do higher levels of SPF in suntan lotion mean stronger protection from the sun?

SPF stands for Sun Protection Factor. The higher the SPF, the better your skin is protected from the sun. Sunscreen that has an SPF of 15 allows you to stay in the sun 15 times longer without getting burnt than if you didn't wear sunscreen at all. So, if you typically begin to burn after 10 minutes of exposure, you can remain in the sun for 150 minutes before beginning to burn. To ensure the ultimate protection, you should also wear sunglasses and a wide brimmed hat that covers your face, ears and neck.

Are children at greater risk of sunburn than adults?

Children are a going concern all year round, but particularly in the summer when they spend so much time outdoors going to the park, swimming and playing sports. They need to take extra precautions in the sun because their baby soft skin isn't fully developed yet. It takes just one or two blistering sunburns during childhood to increase their risk of developing skin cancer later in life. Make sure your kids wear sunscreen with an SPF of 15 or higher and a big hat to shield their sensitive, little bodies from harmful UV rays.

Who are the people most susceptible to the harmful effects of the sun?

If you have fair colouring or have had a previous bout with skin cancer, you should take extra precautions in the sun. Keep your head covered with a wide brimmed hat and wear sunscreen with a high SPF all year round.

If you do get sunburnt, what's the best method of treatment?

If you get sunburnt, you should apply a cool cloth right away to avoid blistering and keep the burnt area moist with a treatment such as Aloe Vera. However, the best treatment is to avoid getting burnt in the first place. Remember, a hat, sunscreen and sunglasses are your best friends if you want to have a happy, burn free summer and a healthy, vital future!

The question posed in a sign at the site of the murder last week of David Rosenzweig - Why? - was the most poignant of all questions in the minds of the Jewish and general communities of Toronto. The day after the stabbing and throughout the week, people attended prayer vigils at the scene of his murder on Bathurst Street near Lawrence Avenue. Please see related stories on pages 3, 4, 5, 11 and 39.

Research brings ME scientists together

By TAMARA TRAUBMAN
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Scientists and politicians from several Middle Eastern states, including Israel, the Palestinian Authority and Iran, met last week with the aim of setting up a synchrotron research facility that will be operated jointly by scientists from the region.

A synchrotron is an exceedingly powerful source of light. Bunches of charged particles – electrons – circulate for several hours inside a long, ring-shaped tube under a vacuum.

Due to the action of special magnet systems, the electrons emit synchrotron light, whose wavelength can range from infrared radiation to x-rays. The emitted light is collected by many different beamlines connected to the ring and conveyed to experimental chambers.

The applications range from pharmaceutical research and development to microchemical analysis for medical, environmental and archeological studies, and from the industrial production of micromechanical parts to powerful radiological techniques.

The project is called Synchrotron-light for Experimental Science and Applications in the Middle East (SESAME) and although all the necessary funding has yet to be raised, the partners in the project are optimistic. The accelerator has already arrived in Jordan, where the project will be based.

The News in Brief

ISRAEL

Barghouti Trial

JERUSALEM — Israel plans to put Palestinian militia leader Marwan Barghouti on trial for abetting numerous terror attacks on Israelis, an Israeli justice official said last week. Barghouti, often cited as a potential successor to Palestinian Authority President Yasser Arafat, was arrested by Israel in mid-April during its anti-terror operation but has not been charged.

Woman Convicted

JERUSALEM — An Israeli Arab woman, Buhaisa Sa'adi, 25, has been sentenced to six months in jail for failing to warn Israeli officials about a plot to carry out a suicide bombing. The attack was carried out in April by a female bomber who killed six people in Jerusalem's Machane Yehuda market.

Belgian Bill Protested

JERUSALEM — Israel has registered a diplomatic complaint about a bill introduced by four senators in Belgium's governing coalition meant to circumvent a court ruling that Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon could not be tried for his role in the 1982 Sabra and Shatila massacres in Lebanon. The court ruled recently that, under the Law of Universal Authority, a war crimes defendant must be present in Belgium to face trial. Israeli officials said Israel kept out of the affair while it was before the courts out of respect for the separation of powers.

WORLD

Pearl Killers Sentenced

HYDERABAD — A Pakistani court last week gave a death sentence to Sheikh Omar, the British-born man who masterminded the kidnapping and murder of Wall Street Journal reporter Daniel Pearl. Omar's three accomplices were given life in jail and ordered to pay fines totalling $62,200 (US). In a video released earlier this year, Pearl was forced to affirm his Jewish heritage before being murdered.

Al Qaeda Link?

LONDON — An Egyptian who killed two Israelis July 4 at Los Angeles International Airport may have met with a deputy of Osama bin Laden. Authorities are investigating whether Hesham Mohamed Hadayet met with Ayman Zawahiri in the United States in 1995 and 1998, the London-based Al-Hayat newspaper reported. U.S. officials say no evidence has been found linking Hadayet to a terrorist group.

SS Man Sentenced

HAMBURG — A former Nazi SS officer was sentenced to seven years in prison for his role in the massacre of 59 Italian prisoners in World War II. Friedrich Engel, also known as the "Butcher of Genoa," has been found guilty by a German court of ordering the murders in 1944. Engel, 93, maintained he was a passive observer and did not supervise the executions. Because of his age, he won't have to serve his sentence, the judge said.

Shchitah Ban Lifted

AMSTERDAM — Jewish ritual slaughter of bulls has been allowed to resume in the Netherlands. Officials had halted the practice, claiming it caused unnecessary suffering. The ban was lifted after Jewish leaders met earlier this month with the agriculture minister.

Scholars Fired in Anti-Israel Boycott

LONDON — Two Israeli academics have been fired from a pair of British scholarly journals as part of a boycott of Israeli universities and cultural and scientific bodies by more than 700 European academics over the "military re-occupation of the West Bank and Gaza."

Last month, Mona Baker, a professor of linguistics at the University of Manchester Institute of Science and Technology, asked Miriam Schlesinger, a lecturer at Bar Ilan University, to step down from the editorial board of The Translator. She also asked Tel Aviv University professor Gideon Toury to resign from the advisory board of the journal Translation Studies Abstracts. Baker owns and edits both journals.

When Schlesinger and Toury refused to resign, Baker fired them. She said their universities, not their nationalities, prompted her decision. Baker had signed a petition urging academics not "to co-operate with official Israeli institutions, including universities" but to "continue to collaborate with, and host, Israeli scientific colleagues on an individual basis."

Schlesinger, who, like Toury, is said to be a liberal and does not support the current Israeli government, said the firings had "nothing to do with our views... We were dismissed because we have the wrong passports."

Jewish groups and Britain's National Union of Students have condemned the boycott, which NUS anti-racism campaigner Daniel Rose said is "nothing short of racism."

Thousands mourn David Rosenzweig

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

More than 2,000 people jammed Clanton Park Synagogue's main sanctuary, social hall and front lawn, spilling into the parking lot and the street to honour David Rosenzweig, the 49-year-old man stabbed to death in the early hours of July 14, in front of a pizzeria at Bathurst and Lawrence. Many stood for the longer-than-two-hour funeral service.

Obituary

Afterward, several hundred followed the hearse on foot as it started its trip to Bathurst Lawn cemetery.

Dignitaries included Ontario Premier Ernie Eves, Attorney General David Young, Opposition Leader Dalton McGuinty, Toronto Mayor Mel Lastman, Police Services Board chair Norm Gardner, MP Art Eggleton and Chief of Police Julian Fantino.

The crowd fell silent as members of the family were escorted into the sanctuary. Unusual today in the Orthodox community, the casket was brought in, and placed in front of the bimah.

Rosenzweig's three oldest sons, their voices breaking, spoke about his dedication to his family, his friends, his career, his Judaism.

Ezra Rosenzweig, the son who was with him when he was killed, called his father a "great father, husband, son, grandfather, uncle, great uncle – a great person."

He loved learning Torah, Ezra said, with his children and friends, and at a daily daf yomi class, where people all over the world study the same portion of Talmud on the same day.

Most of all, he taught the family to try their best, and never to hate.

Ezra promised to "remember how you did things, and how you wanted things done," and to follow his example.

Son Sholom noted that when their grandfather was hospitalized at Mount Sinai, his father walked down from their Downsview home to be with him on Rosh Hashanah.

David Rosenzweig's pride in being Jewish was what struck son Mayer. "He never hid that he was Jewish. It may be what caused his death, but he wouldn't have had it any other way."

The boys spoke of David's helping each of them prepare for their bar mitzvah, something he had just started with son Shragee, his taking time for each child, and how devoted he was to his parents and in-laws. Every Shabbat, regardless of the weather, he would walk down to his parent's house, take his father to shul in a wheelchair, carrying him to the bimah when he had an aliyah.

David Rosenzweig

Later, even after long days at work as a chartered accountant at Newman and Swersky, he would stop in to see his mother every evening.

Shabbat and holidays were wonderful for the family, said Mayer, describing how they would sit around and learn and talk and generally have fun for hours after the meal.

Brother Arthur said that the world- wide press coverage of the tragedy of the murder "missed the point. The world lost an exceptional person." David "gave the same honour to his work as to his religious principles," and was an example of integrity to his clients, colleagues and family.

As well, he "represented a person totally integrated into society, both in his professional life and as a religious Jew... He taught his children to blend the religious and secular in their lives, as he did."

With a wistful smile, Arthur recalled his brother simply as "a guy who tried to do the right thing."

Rabbi Yitzchok Kerzner, spiritual leader of Clanton Park, said that the Jewish reaction to this tragedy must be "to love life more passionately; to enhance and encourage [the ideal of] the sanctity of life.

Coverage of a horrible crime

From the editor's desk

The horrible, senseless killing last week in Toronto of David Rosenzweig struck many of the city's Jews like a thunderous earthquake, cutting out from under our feet, at least temporarily, the familiar supports on which we rely for our emotional equilibrium, sense of place and belonging.

Random, violent crimes, including murder, alas, are not unimaginable on the streets of Toronto or anywhere else in Canada. But random, violent crimes and murder on the streets of Toronto or anywhere else in Canada, specifically, deliberately, purposefully aimed at Jews, are unimaginable.

Thus, when the news spread that wonderful, kind David Rosenzweig had been murdered, many of us feared that the unimaginable had indeed happened. As of this writing, we still cannot definitively define or disquiet our fears.

That uncertainty, however, became a distraction, and as the week wore on, we – as individuals and as a community – lost our focus.

The immeasurable suffering and inconsolable loss of the Rosenzweig family was virtually overshadowed by the almost surrealistic sideshow, conducted in and also by the media, of trying to divine the killer's true and total motives.

To be sure, it is imperative that we know precisely why Rosenzweig was killed. It is imperative for at least three reasons: for the sake of the law that a court of justice will apply in the circumstances; for the sake of the steps, if any, that the Jewish and larger community must take as result; and, of course, for the sake of the truth.

But only the trial of the accused murderer will be able to tell us why wonderful and kind David Rosenzweig was killed.

Until then we can only speculate.

There was a great deal of such speculation along with news coverage and related commentary in the pages of the local Toronto newspapers last week.

Two writers in particular deserve our attention: Christie Blatchford and Thomas Walkom.

Christie Blatchford writes in the venerable newspaper traditions of reporters such as Ernest Hemingway and Jimmy Breslin. She is one of Canada's best feature writers, a master at capturing the myriad details of scenes and subjects that elevate her reports from mere narratives to compelling stories.

She is unrivaled at marking out the full physical and psychological terrain of a story. Her writing can be both nuanced and brazen, questioning and assertive, all at the same time.

Moreover, she writes prolifically.

In obvious recognition of her unique talents, and of her readers' attachment to her writing, the editors at The National Post grant her stories wide space in the paper. And her readers are well rewarded for that space.

Tuesday through Saturday last week, she wrote at least 10,000 words in six separate stories on various aspects of Rosenzweig's murder: the pained and painful funeral; the presence of victim identification (ZAKA) volunteers from Israel who happened, by coincidence, to be in Toronto last week; the arrest of the murder suspect; the question of the motive for the crime; the anxiety within the Jewish community; and the possible wider implications of the crime for the general community.

Her stories were respectful of the grieving family, exhaustive of the many issues, thoughtful and contemplative. They painted a painstakingly detailed and accurate picture of the unspeakable sorrow that befell the Rosenzweig family and of the immobilizing distress and turmoil that gripped the Jewish community of Toronto last week. She deserves high praise for providing that picture.

Thomas Walkom, by contrast, is neither a news reporter nor a feature writer. He is a commentator. On Tuesday last week in the Toronto Star, he wrote what can only be characterized, charitably, as a very problematic commentary.

He stated that anti-Semitism, which "has persisted for centuries" and which is "the Christian West's great shame," was "the psychological context of the Rosenzweig murder." He then pointed to "a political context too" for the murder, namely, Israel. But he did not cite the obvious, key, staring-in-the-face, Israel-related fact of that "political context" – that there has been a rise, around the world in anti-Semitic incidents due to Israel's conflict with the Palestinians.

Rather, in a breathtakingly illogical non-sequitur, he cited the obvious, but trite and wholly irrelevant fact that "it is perfectly appropriate to criticize Israel," immediately adding his personal anti-Israel propaganda to the preceding irrelevancy: "for taking much of the land of another people and illegally occupying the rest."

Far more objectionable, however, Walkom then raised a dangerously mischievous "straw-man" argument, that was also entirely irrelevant to the issues under discussion. "Even the idea of Israel as an explicitly Jewish state seems, to many non-Jews, outdated and fraught with contradiction."

Subsequently, Walkom purported to dismantle the "straw-man" by saying it is "stunning naivete" for many Jews (as opposed to the non-Jews who question the idea of Israel as an explicitly Jewish state) "to even ask these questions."

But the reader could not but doubt the bona fides of his dismantling the "straw-man" due to the absolute absurdity in a commentary on Rosenzweig's murder, of his having introduced the odious subject in the first place – and thereby placed it on the table – of the legitimacy of Israel's existence.

STANDING VIGIL FOR VICTIMS OF TERROR: Last Wednesday, the day before Tisha b'Av, groups from different synagogues and organizations each came for one hour of a day-long vigil on Bloor Street to commemorate the innocent Israelis killed in the recent wave of terrorism. Toronto's vigil, co-ordinated by the Israel-Now Consortium, was one of 20 programs organized by the American Zionist Federation across North America and Great Britain last week. Participant Carole Sterling said it was appropriate to remember all the lives lost at the same time as we remember the loss of the two Temples in Jerusalem. Jew murdered but was it a hate crime?

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

The senseless, unprovoked murder of 49-year-old David Rosenzweig has shocked many in the Jewish community, generated headlines around the world and raised questions as to whether his stabbing is symptomatic of a wider surge of Jew-hatred in Canada.

In Israel, the incident received front-page coverage while CNN was quick to report that an Orthodox Jew had been struck down in normally tranquil Toronto.

For many, the murder of a visibly distinguishable Jew was part of a increasingly disturbing pattern. B'nai Brith Canada hurried to release an Interim Audit of Antisemitic Incidents, in which it reported a 63 per cent increase over the same six-month period the year before. B'nai Brith president Rochelle Wilner proclaimed that "it certainly feels" like "open season on Jews."

Canadian Jewish Congress took a different approach, acknowledging the fear in the community while offering reassurance: "We have great confidence in the manner in which the Toronto Police Service is conducting this investigation. We urge every Jewish leader to join us in reminding the public that the streets of Toronto are safe to walk. It is not 'open season' on Jews," said Ed Morgan, chair of CJC's Ontario region.

Morgan agreed the murder bore many of the hallmarks of a hate crime, and he said Congress had received many calls from elderly Jews who are afraid to go outside.

But, he said, "even if they determine it is a hate crime, there is not a general atmosphere of hate against Jews in Toronto."

Congress would "wait and reserve judgement" until the police concluded their investigation, he added.

Meanwhile, B'nai Brith reported 197 anti-Semitic incidents in the first six months of 2002 compared to 121 the year before. Most took place in Toronto and Montreal.

Frank Dimant, executive vice-president of B'nai Brith, told a news conference late last week that the murder is part of a larger pattern of attacks and threats against Jews

Dimant said "a one-month high alert" was proclaimed by police in Ottawa over fears Jews would be targeted. "That doesn't indicate to me it's business as usual in Canada."

Visible Jews are experiencing the anti-Semitic atmosphere more than others, he continued. Mothers are telling their children to wear baseball caps instead of kippot while "the workplace has become infested with anti-Semitism."

Dimant said he would turn over to police two sworn affidavits by eyewitnesses stating that the term "f...ing Jews," was used shortly before Rosenzweig was stabbed. That evidence shows the murder fits the description of a hate crime, he stated.

(National Post columnist Christie Blatchford reported that Shloimo Sufrin, who was outside the pizza restaurant the night of the murder, said he heard the slur "you f...ing Jews.")

Although police initially said they would investigate whether the murder was motivated by anti-Semitism, within a few days, Chief Julian Fantino was discounting the possibility it was a hate crime.

Under the Criminal Code, if a crime is found to be motivated by hate, a judge may decide to impose a stiffer sentence than for the same act not motivated by hate.

It took police less than two days to track down the main suspect in the killing, Christopher McBride, 20. He was arrested along with his girlfriend, Mercedes Asante, 19, by a police tactical squad in an apartment a few kilometres from the murder scene.

McBride was charged with first degree murder, while Asante was charged with being an accessory after the fact.

A third man who allegedly was with them the night of the incident was questioned and released prior to the police raid.

At first blush, the murder bore all the hallmarks of a hate crime, Morgan said. The alleged killer's head was shaved, he sported a tattoo that resembled a Celtic Cross, a symbol appropriated by skinhead groups, he barged into a kosher pizzeria late at night and harassed the clientele, and then he attacked the bearded and kippah-clad Rosenzweig, who was a visible Jew in a Jewish neighbourhood.

"Why else would a skinhead be at a kosher restaurant other than to harass the Jewish customers?" Morgan asked. "When an Orthodox man is killed for no reason whatsoever, it seems like a hate crime."

Given the spate of attacks on Jews around the world, particularly in France and Belgium, as well as anti-Semitic incidents in Canada, such an attack raises the red flag of a hate crime, he added.

Det. James Hogan of the police hate crimes unit, said his office had been assisting homicide detectives in investigating the suspect's background and said they had found no evidence of any affiliation with white supremacist or skinhead groups.

As to racial motivation for the attack, "It just isn't there," Hogan said.

Investigation in preliminary stages

The police investigation, though only in its preliminary stages, seems to suggest the killing took place after the alleged perpetrator became angry at a drug deal gone bad and had gone out on the streets in a foul mood looking for trouble, Hogan said.

The alleged killer was staying with a friend (the third man) who lived almost across the street from the kosher pizzeria where the incident began.

"It looks like he was angry and walked the streets looking for trouble. He ended up at the pizzeria; one of the places that was open was the pizzeria," Hogan said.

As to published reports that the suspect said "I got a rabbi," or something to that effect, after the stabbing, Hogan said: "I would classify that as a rumour at this point." He said it wasn't clear whether that statement was actually made.

Leo Adler, director of national affairs for Friends of Simon Wiesenthal Center for Holocaust Studies, said that "while we don't want to overstate the case, on the other hand, the police seem to be trying to downgrade incidents that involve anti-Semitic acts.

"There may be a denial by the authorities, much as there was in France.

"Generally speaking," he continued, "Canada is a safe place, relatively speaking, for Jews. What you are getting is a build up of intolerance for Jews."

Repeating a theme echoed by all three Jewish advocacy groups, Adler said the atmosphere changed after the Durban conference on racism last year and with the continued violence in the Middle East. (B'nai Brith's data showed spikes in anti-Semitic incidents in April and May, coinciding with Israel's military operations in the Palestinian territories.)

"Events in the Middle East and Europe are having an impact here as well," Adler said.

At a vigil last week where Rosenzweig was fatally stabbed in the back, people left memorial candles and flowers on the spot where he was killed. Rabbi Shmuel Spero of the Anshei Minsk Synagogue led a group of young people in chanting tehillim (psalms). Ironically, Rosenzweig was killed in front of a light standard on which was tacked a poster advertising a community rally against anti-Semitism.

Many at the vigil were quick to label the incident racially-motivated.

Alan Burger, past president of Shaarei Shomayim Synagogue and an acquaintance of Rosenzweig, said police "must be wearing blindfolds when they said it [wasn't a hate crime]. How could it not be? He went to a Jewish pizza place and stabbed an innocent man.

Police were "trying to lower attention and make it antiseptic, that's all."

Jack Muskat, president of the Association for the Soldiers of Israel, said "what else could it be" but a hate crime. "Look at the area he picked. It's a Jewish neighbourhood with religious people. He didn't pick a church."

Rob Baruch, 29, said he was shocked at the incident given that he had grown up in the neighbourhood and considered it friendly and peaceful.

"I think the Jewish community thinks it's a hate crime. I think it was."

Tracey Baruch, 30, agreed and compared the police reaction in Toronto to the statements by police in Los Angeles when they refused to label an attack on an El Al counter as a terrorist incident. "But when you target a particular population, what else can it be?"

Their friend, Jamie Alexander, 28, dissented somewhat. "My initial reaction is that it was a hate crime. I would lean towards that, but I'm not the type of person to jump to conclusions." Alexander said he wanted to hear the final police determination before deciding whether it was or not.

Edmond Lipsitz said he thought it was a hate crime, while Minnie Obouchowski, who brought a memorial candle to the site, said she grieved for the family. "Why did it happen and he left so many children?"

"Why did they pick on him? He had to come here to get killed? Why?"

In the King David Restaurant last Monday, where the alleged killer harassed patrons, a man who gave his name only as "Eddie," 18, continued to prepare pizzas behind the counter, just like he did on the night when he confronted a trio of young people who were there "to make violence with the customers."

They were "acting violent," he said in broken English.

Eddie, a Muslim from Afghanistan, said he followed the three outside and when he told the ringleader to calm down, the man pulled out a knife and took a swipe at him, nicking him on the arm. A moment later, Rosenzweig was stabbed. The entire incident, from beginning to end, lasted barely a couple of minutes, he said.

Inside the restaurant, owner David Hazan explained that nothing remotely resembling the incident had ever occurred there before. The restaurant, which is popular with Orthodox customers after Shabbat ends, was full that night. While many customers have made a point of coming to the restaurant to show solidarity in the wake of the murder, Hazan said he has also fielded a hate message from an anonymous caller who said, "I'm going to kill all Jews."

Among the customers at the King David were Yisroel Stefansky and Rabbi Benzion Oiring, both members of Zaka, the Israeli rescue team that plays a key role at terrorism scenes by gathering all human remains and blood for Jewish burial.

Stefansky had been in Toronto for a little more than a week to raise the organization's profile and drum up financial support, while Rabbi Oiring had flown in the morning of the attack to get some respite from the violence in Israel.

Barely off the plane, Rabbi Oiring joined Stefansky at the crime scene, where they performed the same tasks they would after a terrorism incident back home.

Turning to Rabbi Oiring, Stefansky said, "He wasn't expecting, and I wasn't expecting, to be doing the same thing that we do in Israel.

"He was coming to Toronto for a holiday."

"Our reaction to hatred, must be love and compassion; to war, peace."

This message was echoed by a written statement issued by wife Chavie.

"My husband's enduring message to our family, our friends, our community and the world at large is one of peace, of kindness and of love between man and man.

"My hope is that those who carry a message of hate in their hearts be one day blessed with the true joy of knowing what it means to be able to transmit love and peace to other human beings, as my husband did every day of his life."

Rosenzweig was also eulogized by Rabbi Mendel Green of Hamilton, Rabbi Moshe Stern of Shaarei Tefillah Congregation and Rabbi Mordechai Sekula of Congregation Emek Tefilah.

Many left the service with tear-stained faces, clutching tissues and holding on to the arms of friends and family. Some hugged their parents and children.

David Rosenzweig's brother Shloimie spoke to The CJN during the shivah. They were very close, speaking every day, he said. "He was gentle, kind and patient. There was something spiritual about him that drew people to him."

He always had time for everyone, Shloimie said, explaining that in spite of his hectic schedule, he always had time to study Torah daily with each of his children.

"People like David are our heroes," he said.

Rosenzweig is survived by his mother, Fay, wife Chavie, children Mayer, Sholom, Ezra, Shragee, Yechiel and Shira and her husband Ezra Jacobovic, three-month-old grandson Avi, and brothers Arthur and Shloimie.

The family has established the David Rosenzweig Fund for Victims of Terror in Israel, through UJA Federation.

Public broadcaster, public hypocrisy

In an article published in the National Post on July 19, noted scholar, Eric Lawee, assistant professor of humanities at York University wrote about an illuminating, yet disturbing, exchange of correspondence he had with the ombudsman of the CBC, David Bazay.

Lawee wrote to the CBC for a clarification of the public broadcaster's policy regarding the use of the term "terrorist." Specifically, Lawee wanted to know why CBC reporters "carefully avoid the terrorist label" in reference to Palestinians, preferring instead to call them "militants," "gunmen" or even "assailants."

Bazay's response, as recorded by Lawee, was shocking.

Asking the CBC reporters to refer to the suicide bombers as terrorists, Bazay suggested, was asking the CBC "to take sides and to embrace the Israeli government's position and its definition of terrorism, which denies the legitimacy of Palestinian resistance."

Ironically and tellingly, Bazay's very own response appears to take sides in the Israeli-Palestinian conflict. For he strongly implies that the suicide bombing tactics used by the Palestinians are justified in furtherance of the "legitimacy of Palestinian resistance." As such, it is, undeniably, a deferential nod toward the ruthless, conscienceless campaign of murder by Palestinian members of Islamic Jihad, Hamas, Hezbollah, Tanzim and Al Aqsa Brigade against defenceless Israelis, so many of whom have been youngsters and children.

Bazay told Lawee that the term "terrorist" should be invoked only "after the fact" of an attack and that the reporters were free to do so if they wished. But such discretionary labelling-by-result, as it were, is wholly unacceptable. How can the slaughter of civilians be defined only after the fact as an act of terror?

Lawee deftly points out the inconsistency, if not the hypocrisy, of the CBC's policy as expressed by Bazay, because the public broadcaster has not hesitated to "take sides" against al-Qaeda and to refer to the U.S.- led campaign in Afghanistan as a campaign against terrorism. "The upshot is," Lawee writes, "that where Palestinians are concerned, no act will be described as terrorist unless those who commit it describe it as such." This is repugnant.

Blowing up innocent, unarmed civilians is not a legitimate act of resistance – not because "Israeli government position" defines it so, but because we, our conscience, our sense of decency define it so.

The definition of terrorism used by the U.S. State Department is "premeditated, politically motivated violence perpetrated against noncombatant targets by subnational groups or clandestine agents, usually intended to influence an audience."

Nothing could be clearer. Palestinian suicide bombing is terrorism. Palestinian suicide bombers are terrorists. Canadians have the right to demand that the publicly funded CBC adopt policies that are not hypocritical, offensive to conscience and decency, and that are not so blatantly discriminatory against Israel.

Murder of David Rosenzweig

I generally take a lunchtime walk up the hill from my office on Cote des Neiges to Remembrance Road and up to Beaver Lake. On the way, starting from the cemetery gates, I see inflammatory, racist graffiti against Jews and Israel, scrawled upon the lampposts with marker or paint. Once a year, city maintenance crews paint over the graffiti.

This graffiti has always upset me. This is not paranoia. Such signs of hate and racism are showing up in many areas of our city and our country. It is not just one culprit. It is becoming a disease. On July 14, we heard of the killing of an Orthodox Jew outside a kosher pizza parlour in Toronto. I hope and pray this abhorrent deed, committed by a skinhead (after first taunting the restaurant patrons), is not a sign of where our tolerance is leading us. Whether or not this hideous act turns out to have been a crime motivated by hate, I hope that liberties do not have to be surrendered to allow for the enjoyment of freedom without fear.

There is no paranoia in my voice.

My father and mother witnessed the massacre of their parents in Europe before their eyes. David Rosenzweig's son watched as his father was murdered before him. We live in a civilized democracy where we should be able to protect our children from witnessing such butchery.

When a white skinhead makes a late-night visit to King David, there is a clear intention to attack its Jewish customers – that is, to commit an anti-Semitic hate crime. The image of young hoodlums descending on Jewish businesses to wreak havoc is painfully familiar to all of us. That the crime resulted in murder makes it much more painful and despicable.

This is not the first anti-Semitic act in Toronto. There have been many others, including the recent torching of a synagogue. No culprit has been found for those earlier attacks. This time there are suspects – young thugs – whom our Canadian educational system has failed to civilize. How many more of their ilk there are and how many anti-Semitic or white supremacist organizations exist is for our police force to dig up and uncover.

Our task is to express our anger now – not after careful consideration, not when the investigation has been completed. We must speak out now, while the wound is fresh. We must tell each other and our friends that we are not ready to tolerate hateful, spiteful little criminals among us. Let us call on the leading citizens of this city to speak up and say in no uncertain terms that we will not stand for intolerance and hate.

Let us make our voices heard.

Judging by his appearance, the murderer of David Rosenzweig identifies with a group whose common denominator is poor educational training, low intelligence and high emotionality. He is a danger and threat not only to Jews, but to members of all communities. Non-Jews ought not to be smug, as monsters who kill without cause are capable of killing anyone.

Jews must stand united

The article by Sara Taieb Carlen, Dispelling myths about Jews in Muslim lands (CJN, July 11) has confirmed for me again that the Jewish people must unite and speak with one voice against our enemies.

No more shall we be humiliated, no more ghettos, no more forced conversion, more massacres, no more crematoria, no more intimidation.

If we stand united, they will get the message. If not now, when?

Saddam's ouster would hurt Israel

If there is one nation in the world that ought to regard with fear and loathing the idea of an American war to remove Iraqi leader Saddam Hussein from power it is not Iraq, but Israel.

There is no question in my mind that as soon as such a war begins, and Saddam realizes it will not end before he is dead, or at the very least taken captive, he will choose to launch every last missile at his disposal, armed with every last weapon of mass destruction in his arsenal, to kill every last Israeli.

Let's face it. No matter how powerful the Israeli Defence Forces or how dedicated they are to saving their country, if just one missile got through – out of thousands that could potentially be launched – an entire city could be wiped out.

The people of Israel need to ask themselves if this is the price they are willing to pay for seeing Saddam out of office.

The three sins of Damascus

By GAL LUFT

Last month was a dark one in the history of the United Nations. In June, the rotating presidency of the Security Council, the body responsible for maintaining international peace and security, fell into the hands of Syria, a country epitomizing anything but peace and known for blatant violations of some of the council's most important resolutions.

As early as biblical times Syria has been a source of instability in the Middle East. "For three sins of Damascus, even for four, I will not turn back my wrath," God said. (Amos 1:2-4) It appears that Syria's sins in that period were minor in comparison to those of our time. But despite its notoriety for harbouring some of the most deadly terrorist groups, and thus being included two decades ago on the United States' list of state sponsors of terrorism, Syria was granted a two-year seat on the council last January by 160 of the 177 UN members. Those who hoped that in the post Sept. 11 era Syria's inclusion in the prestigious body would moderate its international behaviour were quickly disappointed. In fact, Syria's conduct since its selection has never been as disharmonious with the spirit of the UN charter as it is now.

First, Damascus has long been a safe haven and a provider of training, logistic support and political guidance for several terrorist groups, such as Ahmad Jibril's Popular Front for the Liberation of Palestine-General Command (PFLP-GC), Palestine Islamic Jihad (PIJ), Abu Musa's Fatah-the-Intifadah, George Habash's Popular Front for the Liberation of Palestine, Hamas and the Lebanese Shiite group Hezbollah. Syria is also one of the few remaining countries to allow uninterrupted passage through its international airport to members of Al Qaeda en route from the Persian Gulf to other Middle Eastern countries. Syria's conduct contradicts three important Security Council resolutions – 1368, 1373 and 1377 – that declare terrorism to be a threat to international peace and security, that stress the accountability of the supporter as well as the perpetrator of terrorist acts, and oblige UN members to limit the ability of terrorist organizations to operate internationally by freezing assets of terrorist organizations and denying them safe haven.

Damascus' support of terrorism has also put it on a collision course with Israel. Since Israel's unilateral withdrawal from south Lebanon in May 2000, Syria has facilitated Hezbollah's military buildup along the Israel-Lebanon border. It has allowed massive amounts of Iranian weapons, including rockets with ranges beyond 70 kilometres, to be shipped to Hezbollah via the Damascus airport. Israel considers these rockets strategic weapons because their range can put approximately 1.5 million Israelis at risk in cities as far from the border as Haifa and Tiberias. Syria's president, Bashar Assad, has done nothing to prevent Hezbollah fighters from frequently attacking northern Israeli settlements and military outposts. These unprovoked attacks have included the use of anti-tank missiles, mortars, rockets, and anti-aircraft weapons directed at Israeli military and civilian aircraft. In the past few weeks Syria has stepped up support for Hezbollah by providing heavy weapons, including missiles and artillery, directly from its own arsenal.

Deeply involved in a war against the Palestinian Authority, Israel has so far been reluctant to open a second front in its north. Prime Minister Ariel Sharon recently stated: "We are demonstrating restraint and are not interested in an escalation in the violence, but we cannot hold back for much longer." But continued Syrian support for Hezbollah's aggression could force Sharon's government to take harsh military action against Syrian targets. Such action could also be triggered as a result of a successful terror attack by one of the Syrian-sponsored Palestinian terrorist groups operating against Israel. This occurred following the June 5 suicide attack in Megiddo Junction, carried out by the Damascus-based Palestinian Islamic Jihad, which killed 17 Israelis and injured 38. The Jihad's leader, Ramadan Shallah, issued a statement from his Damascus office claiming responsibility for the attack, hence leaving no doubt about Syria's consent to the organization's strategy of terror.

It is precisely this strategy that made U.S. President George W. Bush, in his June 24 Middle East speech, demand that Syria cease its strategy of supporting terrorism. "Syria must choose the right side in the war on terror by closing terrorist camps and expelling terrorist organizations," Bush said. The Bush administration clearly understands that Syria is doing all it can to fan the flames of the Israeli-Palestinian conflict and that a continuation of such behaviour is likely to lead to a regional war in the Middle East.

Syria's second sin is the violation of Security Council resolution 425 from 1978 that calls for the withdrawal of all foreign forces from Lebanon and supporting the territorial integrity, sovereignty and political independence of Lebanon within its internationally recognized boundaries. Under false claim that it had been "invited" to protect Lebanon from itself, Syria's grip of its feeble Arab neighbour, enforced by the presence of 25,000 Syrian troops, is still tight. Most Lebanese object to Syria's infringement on the sovereignty of their country and would like it to remove its forces from Lebanese soil. Regrettably, the international community has, so far, failed to act decisively on behalf of Lebanon's four million people. American and European officials who privately resent Syria's conduct have been reluctant to express their views publicly or even use the word "occupation" to characterize Syria's presence in Lebanon. Only a public declaration by the United States, the European Union and the other permanent members of the Security Council that Syria should withdraw its troops, followed by massive diplomatic pressure, and perhaps even sanctions, could unleash the forces of liberation operating within Lebanon. Without such action, there is no chance that Assad will voluntarily relinquish his control of Lebanon.

> 'Syria is one of the world's main propagators of anti-Semitism and Holocaust denial'

Syria's third wrongdoing is its violation of the UN-imposed embargo on Iraq. For more than a year, Iraq has been using Syria for the smuggling of military systems and other banned material. Furthermore, Syria violates the U.N.'s "oil-for-food" program by allowing illegal exports of Iraqi oil to Syria through a reopened oil pipeline between the two countries. This 150,000 barrel-per-day pipeline allows the two countries to share $2 billion (US) a year in revenue from oil sales. A significant portion of the money is used to support terrorism and to procure weapons, including weapons of mass destruction.

No less disturbing is the fact that in recent years Syria has established itself as one of the world's main propagators of anti-Semitism and Holocaust denial. Studies of the Syrian school system reveal a shocking picture of intensive incitement of racial hatred, religious intolerance and, worse, outright genocide. Syrian textbooks and other learning materials issued by the centralized authoritarian regime in Damascus advocate the ultimate extermination of the entire Jewish people, promising Syrian children martyrdom by fighting and killing Jews.

Even more disturbing is the repeating use of anti-Semitic statements by Syria's official leadership. Damascus' official daily, Tishrin, has a long tradition of accusing Israel of massacres and crimes against Palestinian children and against sites sacred to Muslims and Christians. Syria's dictator Assad could not contain his anti-Semitic feelings even during a papal visit to Syria in May 2001, when he blamed Israelis for trying to "kill the principles of all religions with the same mentality in which they betrayed Jesus Christ and tortured him, and in the same way they tried to betray and kill the Prophet Mohammed." He also suggested the Jewish people had unjustly benefitted from exaggerating their past sufferings and that Israel's society is "more racist than Nazism."

Assad's close associate and one of the founding fathers of Syria's current Ba'ath regime, defence minister Mustafa Tlass, is the author of a widely distributed book that describes in detail how Jews abduct Christian and Muslim children, slaughter them and drain their blood in order to prepare Passover matzot. "Generation after generation has passed on this message of the treachery of the Jews," he wrote.

It is a sad statement that a country with as bad a record as Syria was given a seat at the head of the body in charge of the world's security. It would be sadder still if Syria's recklessness and intransigence became the catalyst that pushed the Middle East even closer to the abyss.

Syria's performance on the international stage merits a place in Bush's "axis of evil," alongside countries of concern like Iraq, Iran and North Korea, rather than on the Security Council. But there is a lot that can be done. The key players in the international community, especially the permanent members of the Security Council, must put heavier pressure on the Syrian government to modify its behaviour and conform to the resolutions of the body on which it sits. They should also use economic, diplomatic, and, if necessary, military, sticks to coerce Assad into compliance with the decisions of the Security Council.

The international community has shown time and again the ability to punish pariahs who threaten world peace. Assad, the young ophthalmologist from Damascus, is one of them. He must learn how to play by the norms of the international system, and, yes, good education can be expensive.

Two celebrations

For many years now, I have been a citizen of both Canada and the United States, something that, in earlier decades, was not permissible. Now it is my pleasure and privilege to celebrate both Canada Day and July 4, the day when Americans celebrate their national independence.

Rabbi Gunther Plaut in Toronto

This year, as quite often before, it was evident to me that south of the border, Independence Day was observed with much greater enthusiasm than Canada Day was here.

I have repeatedly asked myself why in Canada we take our nationhood for granted, while south of the border there is a high level of patriotism, which some critics deride as chauvinism. In Canada, on the other hand, the day goes by with most citizens unaware that it is a holiday altogether – except that they do not go to work.

Since I hold citizenship in both countries, I feel entitled to offer a suggestion: a modest degree of Canadian patriotism would do all of us some good. We live in an open society, a splendid land that extends from sea to sea and offers most of us magnificent opportunities for self-expression.

There is, however, some difference in the way people here and in the United States view themselves as citizens. I think that we in Canada simply take our citizenship, with all that it implies, for granted, while south of the border, citizens invest their identity with a sense of national pride.

Both attitudes have strengths and weaknesses. Obviously, patriotism fires one's desire to be worthy of the privilege to be a citizen, while taking our privileged condition for granted not only isolates us from emotional extravagance, it also deprives us of the kind of pride that ought to be ours.

Moderation is desirable in most instances, and that is also true when it comes to the love of one's country. Many other nations feel that they are the best, and it is their privilege to cherish that sentiment.

I think we, in Canada, do not need the sense of being "Number 1," but we do need a feeling of gratitude that we have the chance to enjoy Canadian liberty and opportunity. An enlargement of that sentiment is something I would welcome, and perhaps next July 1 we can manage to amplify the noise of fireworks with a bit of our own emotion.

Israel in Algonquin Park

Something about Friday evenings sets them apart from other times in the week. Earlier this month, a warm Friday evening proved particularly memorable. Instead of being at home in Jerusalem, I was in Ontario's fabled Algonquin Park at Camp Tamakwa, where my wife Galya and I are working and our children are campers this summer.

Robert Sarner in Jerusalem

At 7:30 p.m., Galya and I joined Tamakwa's 400 campers and staff at an outside amphitheatre facing South Tea Lake. The view was spectacular, the tranquillity overwhelming and the air intoxicating. A soothing breeze blew in off the water and the pre-sunset light washed everything in a soft golden glow. The occasional call of a loon was a further reminder that there is no greater delight to the senses than nature's timeless spectacle, especially in Algonquin Park.

Every Friday, in a time-honoured tradition, Tamakwans assemble after dinner at an area called the Slope. Galya and I sat at the top of the Slope's wooden bleachers, marvelling at the perfect combination of water, sky, earth, rock and trees before us. The peacefulness was almost hypnotic, doubly so for its sharp contrast to our recent reality in Jerusalem. Only two weeks earlier, nearly 30 people were killed and dozens wounded in our city in two horrific terrorist bombings, one of which occurred a few minutes from our home. From where we were now sitting at the Slope, Israel seemed to be on another planet.

A non-religious, predominantly Jewish camp, Tamakwa welcomes the onset of Shabbat in its own way – first at dinner with the lighting of candles and the reciting of the Kiddush, and afterwards with a secular service at the Slope. It is the quietest, most reflective time in the camp's busy schedule. Each week, members of a different cabin stand before the camp community and express their thoughts and feelings about a chosen subject. The simple but moving ceremony concludes with a reminder of the evening activities on tap known as the Hobby Hub.

A few days earlier, I had offered to lead an open discussion on Israel for the Hobby Hub. But on Friday, when I heard about the other options available, I wondered if anyone would come to my session. We were, after all, at summer camp after a long, action-packed day. Surely, developments in the Middle East could not compete against the dizzying choice of the other activities: fortune telling, Irish folk dancing, arm wrestling, mind reading, separate talks on professional hockey and the Simpsons TV show, a home-run derby, a canoe outing and something billed as "back tickling."

But to my surprise, 25 campers and staff showed up to talk about Israel. The group included campers and staff of all ages, both Jewish and gentile, from Canada and the United States. One of Tamakwa's two senior directors also attended.

After giving a five-minute introduction, I posed several questions and threw the floor open to discussion. The response was impressive. I was amazed by the degree of interest in Israel and concern for its well-being. People asked me about Israeli politics; whether Prime Minister Ariel Sharon is popular; whether the Arabs really want peace; and about military responses to terrorism. One 10-year-old girl asked: "Is the United States really on the side of Israel?" Staff members asked about the history of the conflict, the future of the West Bank and the Gaza Strip, about Palestinian grievances and about the motivation of suicide bombers. People were particularly curious to know how my family and I cope with living in Jerusalem in the face of so many terrorist attacks, and why we stay.

The session was supposed to last 45 minutes but lasted twice as long. Over the next few days, campers and staff engaged me in further discussion about Israel and several requested I host another session soon. People also talked to our three children about Israel and practised their Hebrew with them.

Being at camp in Canada is a welcome reprieve from the strife back home and an extraordinary experience for us, one that wouldn't have been possible if Tamakwa's two owners, Vic Norris and David Bale, had not been so receptive to having an Israeli family as part of their camp community this summer. The hospitality and concern for Israel shown to us by Tamakwans have made us feel less far from home.

The mythology of Jerusalem and Oslo's failure

The Arab-Israeli conflict remains a popular arena for mythmaking and historical fiction, particularly for journalists and policy-makers. Despite the costs of the simplistic fairy tales that have guided policy for years (and Ottawa is far from immune), the factory continues to churn out nonsense.

Gerald Steinberg in Jerusalem

The latest fiction is that Israeli and Palestinian negotiators were close to agreement between the Camp David and Taba talks two years ago. In this narrative, the failure was due to pressure tactics applied by former U.S. president Bill Clinton and former Israeli prime minister Ehud Barak. This fantasy is designed to absolve Palestinian Authority President Yasser Arafat and his cohorts of responsibility, and to convert the subsequent campaign of terrorism into a "spontaneous popular uprising," as portrayed by pro-Palestinian propagandists.

Robert Malley, a low-level official in the Clinton administration, is the major creative artist behind this version of history. In addition to his articles in Foreign Affairs and The New York Review of Books (refuted point by point by Barak and Benny Morris), Malley has been able to insinuate his creative myths in a report of the International Crisis Group (another NGO supported by Canadian taxpayers).

This myth, like many others, is easily unmasked by anyone with the slightest knowledge of the details. In this case, the Palestinian position on Jerusalem, the most sensitive and important of the "permanent status issues" demonstrates Arafat's true intentions. When Jerusalem finally came up at Camp David, Arafat's response was unambiguous. As far as the Palestinian terrorist leader is concerned, 3,000 years of Jewish history never happened. In responding to Malley's myths, Barak revealed that during the talks Arafat declared: "There is nothing there [i.e., no trace of a temple on the Temple Mount]." Aides naively thought that by bringing in various references, including learned encyclopedia articles, they could "educate" Arafat, but he did not budge.

Former U.S. chief negotiator Dennis Ross noted that during the 15 days of talks at Camp David, the only new idea offered by Arafat was that "the Jewish Temple never existed in Jerusalem as the Jews believe," but perhaps it was located "somewhere in Nablus." Indeed, the same malicious nonsense is repeated in Palestinian and many other Arab and Islamic textbooks, as well as religious tracts and newspapers.

If Arafat and Palestinian leaders resorted to distorting 3,000 years of history in order to justify their hatred of Israel and their campaign of terrorism and brutality, the claim that they were ready for peace two years ago is sheer nonsense. The truth, as Barak finally understood, is that the Palestinian creed "does not recognize the existence of a Jewish people or nation," holds that Israel "has no right to exist, and seeks its demise." No agreement on Jerusalem was ever within reach, and the entire Oslo process was a sham.

Indeed, until the Palestinians and the Islamic world stop the farcical and demeaning attempts to rewrite history, and dismantle the mental obstacles that cause them to deny the reality of Jewish claims and rights – starting in Jerusalem – there is no sense talking about far-reaching peace agreements.

Every Palestinian, including Arafat, who has ever set foot in Jerusalem has seen the crowds of Jews – tens of thousands of them – filling the plaza in front of the Western Wall on the major Jewish holidays. On Shavuot, just before dawn, Jews from every part of Jerusalem pour in from every alley and street to congregate at the Western Wall, the last remnant of the Second Temple destroyed by the Romans 2,000 years ago. The crowds are also out in force on Tisha b'Av to mourn for Jerusalem and the Temple. Only deliberate or feigned blindness can explain the denials of Jewish historical links in the holiest of cities.

Thus, instead of wasting time and money in international conferences looking for magic peace formulae, or accepting the latest myths and attempts to rewrite history, the key is far simpler. Once the Palestinians and Arabs acknowledge the Jewish history of Jerusalem, the rest will be easy.

The Kirshner File

Occupation of Area A raises key questions

When Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon swept to power a year and a half ago, trouncing the hapless Ehud Barak in a general election, he let it be known that Israel would never occupy the Palestinian autonomous areas in the West Bank.

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

Indeed, it seemed inconceivable that Israel would take that drastic step and thereby roll back the territorial status quo enshrined in the Oslo accords.

In the unstable, unpredictable milieu of the Middle East, however, the certainty of what tomorrow will bring cannot be foretold.

But after the latest suicide bombings in June, which killed 26 Israelis in just two stomach-turning days, Israel launched Operation Determined Path, storming into the major Palestinian towns of the West Bank – Ramallah, Nablus, Jenin, Tulkarm, Bethlehem, Qalqilya and Hebron – placing its inhabitants under an on-again, off-again curfew and announcing its intention to remain there until the cessation of Palestinian attacks.

In retrospect, the occupation, which has been justified by no less a personage than U.S. President George W. Bush, was inevitable – given the mounting death toll exacted on Israeli civilians by Palestinian suicide bombers, the corresponding pressure on the government to squelch the unbridled terrorism, the failure of Operation Defensive Shield in March and April to disable the terrorist infrastructure and the Palestinian Authority's inability or unwillingness to stop the carnage.

But what ultimately encouraged Sharon to take the momentous decision to erase the line between Israel and the Palestinian autonomous areas was the attitude of the United States, its chief ally and patron.

Washington, having repeatedly criticized Israeli incursions into these areas since Sharon's electoral victory, altered its policy after concluding that Yasser Arafat, president of the Palestinian Authority, was directly involved in terrorism and was thus part of the problem.

Yet long before the United States gave up on Arafat as a viable, trustworthy partner, Sharon had been under increasingly intense pressure to retake Area A, which, under Oslo, was designated to fall under the full control of the Palestinians.

Gen. Moshe Yaalon, who was recently inducted as Israel's 17th chief of staff, and Avi Dichter, the head of the Shin Bet, Israel's internal intelligence agency, both called for an occupation of Palestinian cities to stem the tide of bloodshed.

In strictly utilitarian terms, the presence of the Israeli army in Area A proved to be beneficial, at least until last week. On July 16, Palestinian terrorists gunned down eight Israelis near the West Bank settlement of Immanuel, and on the following day, two suicide bombers killed three civilians, two of whom were foreign workers, in Tel Aviv. Until then, not a single Israeli had been killed in a terrorist incident, though the Israeli army had issued dire warnings that suicide bombers – the new darlings of the Palestinian masses – were poised to strike yet again.

Beyond providing a 3½-week respite from the deadly cycle of bombings in its very heartland, Israel's occupation of Area A and its decision to assume responsibility for its own security, as opposed to sub-contracting it out to Palestinian police forces, raises several issues.

Has Sharon stifled the peace process, such as it was, by conquering Area A? Certainly, he has driven the last nail into Oslo, which he had always despised. He did so, amazingly enough, with the grudging co-operation and complicity of the Labour party, which had championed it.

Most observers do not believe that the Palestinians will return to the negotiating table until there is an Israeli exit from Area A. But judging from comments made by Sharon and the former Israeli chief of staff, Gen. Shaul Mofaz, Israel intends to remain there indefinitely. Sharon spoke of "a very long [period] of time," while Mofaz declared that only Arafat's expulsion or his replacement as president of the Palestinian Authority might prompt Israel to withdraw from Area A.

Additional questions worth asking are whether a prolonged occupation will deepen Israel's isolation, intensify Palestinian bitterness, reinforce the trend toward radicalism among Palestinians and therefore undermine the chances of resolving the Arab-Israeli conflict through diplomatic means. And if bilateral negotiations stall, what comes next?

Is Israel destined to be a besieged garrison state coarsened by an occupation and doomed by a demographic scenario in which Jews are a minority in their own country?

If the seemingly endless violence continues, can Israel's economy thrive and can Israel attract new immigrants? And how many ordinary, middle-class Israelis will tolerate this situation before they emigrate?

There is also this to consider: Does the occupation signify the beginning of the end of the Palestinian Authority? Weakened by closures, curfews, corruption, inefficiencies, authoritarianism and Operation Defensive Shield, the Palestinian Authority is shaky at best. But what will happen if it collapses? Will Israel be forced, against its will and better judgment, to rule the West Bank and provide essential services ranging from garbage collection to education?

Gen. Moshe Yaalon

More to the point, would the vacuum created by the passing of Arafat's regime be filled by Islamic fundamentalists from Hamas and Islamic Jihad? Or would moderate elements fill the gap?

It seems clear that Arafat, the ultimate survivor, may be on his way out, having lost the trust of most Israelis and having incurred the wrath of the United States. According to the Israeli army's general staff, Arafat's stature is dropping so precipitously that he will be gone within six months. Is this assessment a function of wishful thinking, or is it honed by cold calculation?

Arafat, in a career stretching back to the 1950s, has survived one disaster after another, from the 1970 civil war in Jordan to Israel's 1982 invasion of Lebanon. But the crisis he faces today, following Bush's bold call for a new Palestinian leadership and Sharon's curt dismissal of him as "irrelevant," could be the most severe he has ever faced.

The precarious state in which Arafat finds himself was underscored by Colin Powell, the U.S. secretary of state. In a speech last month, Powell said that the Bush administration will not deal with Arafat in the future unless, in Bush's words, the Palestinian Authority embraces democracy, confronts corruption and firmly rejects terrorism. But what will the United States – and Israel – do if Arafat wins the presidential election called for January? Boycott him and allow Palestinian rage to fester and explode into new waves of violence and Israeli counterstrikes?

The majority of Palestinians, signs of their displeasure with his performance notwithstanding, support Arafat – a symbol of Palestinian nationalism and aspirations for statehood – as do pivotal Arab nations such as Egypt, Jordan and Saudi Arabia, not to mention European and Asian countries and, last but not least, Canada.

Shimon Peres, Israel's foreign minister and one of the architects of the Oslo accords, was quoted in late June as saying that he could still work with Arafat. But within days, he suddenly changed his tune, saying that he, too, favored an alternative Palestinian leadership to Arafat. All this may be purely academic, since Arafat intends to stay on.

Victory for common sense, and a setback

Crying out for comment:

The Israeli government was as wise to shelve a controversial bill concerning the Israel Lands Law as it was originally foolish to support it. The legislation in question, which was proposed by the National Religious Party to circumvent a Supreme Court ruling, would have prevented Israeli Arabs from buying homes in Jewish municipalities on state land. The issue arose after Adel Kaadan, an Israeli citizen, sought to buy state-owned land so that he could build a house in Katzir, an all-Jewish community in the Galilee. The bill that would have enshrined Katzir's reactionary, blinkered attitude was ill-conceived and racist, would have exacerbated Israel's unsettled relations with its large Arab minority and would have played into the hands of those who claim that Israel is governed by racist and apartheid precepts. Prime Minister Ariel Sharon did not show the required leadership. He initially backed the bill in principle, and left the cabinet meeting before the vote took place. Let us hope that this misguided legislation will never see the light of day. It is the last thing Israel needs.

The decision by the Egyptian owner and editor of The Translator and Translation Studies Abstracts – semi-annual journals based in Britain – to oust two Israeli scholars from the editorial advisory board on the grounds of their Israeli nationality is grotesque and absolutely unacceptable, and should be rectified immediately lest it create a precedent. In the name of decency and academic freedom, it cannot be allowed to stand.

Jewish Life

Books for grown-ups

It's time for our second annual anti-summer reading review, idiosyncratically filled with Jewish gems and spiritually inspiring material. This month we'll deal with adult titles and tackle books for children at a later date. The list is unabashedly arbitrary and filled with gaps.

JEWISH EDUCATION
The Next Generation

The Dawn, by Yoram Hazony. One of the most difficult things for a writer to do is to tackle a subject that has been raked over the literary coals, not just for decades but for millennia. Yet Hazony, the author of the well-known polemic about contemporary Israel, The Jewish State, here offers a fresh reading of Megillat Esther based on creative and often startling insights grounded in classical political theory. Haman and Achashverosh evolve from cartoon villains into more complex, but equally dangerous, perpetrators of a totalitarian system.

Tree of Knowledge, Tree of Life, by Michael Rosenak. A pre-eminent scholar of Jewish education at Hebrew University, Rosenak is brilliant at modelling ways that relationships can be created between Jewish texts and the reader, and how contemporary issues can be gleaned from traditional words. Whether he is parsing the Akedah or making a case for the wicked son at the seder, Rosenak consistently helps to provide new avenues for education to guide the student to a meaningful encounter with Judaism.

The Letter in the Scroll, by Jonathan Sacks. The chief rabbi of the Commonwealth has produced a very inspiring work for those seeking an intelligent and coherent rationale for being Jewish in the modern world. He reminds us of the revolutionary character of Judaism at its inception and stresses the fundamental importance of the contribution that each Jew can make to the mosaic of Torah.

Holy Brother, by Yitta H. Mandelbaum. Truth is definitely stranger than fiction, if these tales about Rabbi Shlomo Carlebach are to be believed. A testimony to a life lived on the basis of reaching out to the other, where to be in a position of doing someone a favour makes the whole day worthwhile. These stories show Rabbi Carlebach influencing young and old, Jew and Gentile, black and white. To say that he is incomparable isn't the half of it.

The Book of Jewish Values, by Joseph Telushkin. A book that should be required reading not just for every adult looking to appreciate the ethical basis of Judaism, but for every teenager who is cynical about religion's ability to imbue us with goodness. The book, in line with newfangled publishing techniques, is divided into an ethical topic for each day of the year (though, in keeping with Jewish tradition, Shabbat is treated as a review day).

Torah of the Mothers, edited by Ora Wisking Elper and Susan Handelman. This book represents the cumulative efforts of a number of women scholars. The opening section is filled with rather moving tributes to the various teachers who have inspired the authors, and subsequent chapters explore Tanach, rabbinic texts and Jewish themes through a female contemporary lens.

May God bless our reading with wisdom and understanding.

David Rosenzweig was a true mensch

Guest Voice

By DAVE GORDON

I didn't want it to be someone I knew. Not someone from my shul. The shock was too much already.

When I saw the ambulances Sunday morning, I thought it might have been a car accident, maybe a drunk driver. But it wasn't that he hobbled home after shul with a big black eye. Much worse. Who would have believed such a report?

We were shocked it happened in North York, at the corner of Bathurst Street and Lawrence Avenue, and not some seedy area of downtown Toronto. We expect things like this to happen in Israel, but not here. Maybe in the United States, but not here. What safer place is there than our own suburban pizza shops, where knife-wielding hooligans would stick out like a sore thumb? These things don't happen in our area. No, not where our kids hang out after Shabbat and grab a pizza or a falafel.

A few years ago when I began davening at Clanton Park, I would duck into my little place in the back row. It was the easiest place to sneak into if/when I was late. There, often sitting next to me or across from me, was David Rosenzweig. From the first day I took my seat, he always smiled and nodded to me, making sure he made eye contact with me as I came in, striking up conversation, always offering a Shabbat meal.

A few times I went over for Shabbat. The Rosenzweigs always made me feel at home. One of David's young sons spent an afternoon showing me his collection of baseball memorabilia.

Before we began a meal once last year, he made a L'chaim for me so I should have haztlachah finding my bashert within the year.

"I'll keep my eyes out for you," he said. "This means we've got some work to do."

Something special must have been in those shot glasses, because the timing seemed just right. About a year later, I met my fiancée-to-be.

David would always make it a point to greet me in shul, either during services or when everyone began filing out.

"Good morning, Dave," he'd always say. "How are you? How's the writing going?"

His sincerity showed me he wasn't giving one of those perfunctory greetings you use just to exchange a few words.

Certainly, dozens of people knew him much better. But when we leave the world, I believe our contribution is judged on how we treat others, friends and strangers alike, from the closest family member to a passing acquaintance.

And I thought, "Here's a mensch, here's someone who always made sure the stranger felt welcome."

"Anytime you need a place for Shabbos, don't hesitate to call me, OK?" he'd say. "You don't even have to call. You can just come. Can we have you over again sometime soon?"

He'd probably be happy to know that these are the fond memories I have of such a warm man who ceaselessly extended his friendship to me. I remember his words so clearly, simply because such warmth emanated from him.

I'll never forget the times I felt a little finger prodding in my back while I was davening. He'd send one of his sons to whisper in my ear to see if I'd like to eat a Shabbat meal with them. I'd often look back, over my shoulder, and see David, a row or two behind, raise his eyebrows, smile and make a little wave to me.

"You're taken care of? Anytime you need a meal, just let me know, OK? Don't be a stranger."

I aspire to be the mensch that he was.

Stephen Jay Gould: parting thoughts

I Have Landed: The End of a Beginning in Natural History*, by Stephen Jay Gould, Harmony, 2002, $39.95

Books
Bernard Baskin

For 28 years, starting in 1974, evolutionary biologist Stephen Jay Gould wrote a monthly article for Natural History magazine. These 300 eagerly awaited consecutive essays were later published in nine volumes with such unlikely titles as The Panda's Thumb,The Flamingo's Smile, and Hen's Teeth and Horse's Toes. This, the final volume, appears just a month after the author's untimely death at the age of 60.

Gould, who was a Harvard University professor of zoology and geology, resurrected the scientific essay from near-extinction. He was a gifted and creative popularizer of often difficult and abstruse material. The positive response to his work assured him that "the intelligent layperson" does exist, that there was a widespread, passionate commitment to continuous learning.

The 31 sprightly essays in I Have Landed touch on subjects as far-reaching and disparate as feathered dinosaurs, the scourge of syphilis, Freud's evolutionary fantasy, Nabokov's drawings of butterflies, the Red Sox baseball team, the topsy-turvy world of Gilbert and Sullivan, the novels of Dorothy Sayers -- and primarily his interest in Darwin and the evolutionary process.

The book's title refers to the words that his grandfather, Papa Joe, a Jewish Hungarian immigrant, scribbled in his notebook on the day he arrived at Ellis Island in New York. "I have landed September 11, 1901." This is a date that coincides exactly 100 years later, with the Twin Towers disaster. For Gould, "It was the most eerie coincidence I have ever encountered."

Earlier in his career Gould opposed organized religion and viewed it as the enemy of science. Later, he believed the "two enterprises" should experience no conflict if they remain within the confines and boundaries of their respective spheres. Gould opted for a golden mean that accorded dignity and distinction to each realm. Science defined the natural world, religion the moral world and the two need not conflict or overlap.

Included in the volume are several pieces written for newspapers and magazines that deal with the Sept. 11 tragedy. He remains convinced that despite the evil of a few persons, good and kind people outnumber all others by thousands to one. The tragedy of human history lies in the enormous potential for destruction in rare acts of evil, not in the high frequency of evil people.

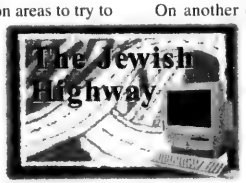
Canadians will feel a sense of pride at the author's reaction to the hospitality of the residents of Halifax, where his plane was grounded right after the Sept. 11 attacks. "And so, Canada, although you are not my home or native land, we will always share this bond of your unstinting hospitality to people who descended upon you as frightened strangers from the skies, and received nothing but solace and solidarity in your embrace of goodness. So, Canada, because we beat as one heart... I will stand on guard for thee."

The essays contain many Jewish references, as well as many condemnations by Gould of anti-Semitism, encountered in medieval literature and in modern pseudo-scientific theories. He introduces readers to a world that one critic has called "rich in quirks and contradictions, human foibles and natural diversity, the sublime and the bumptious."

This volume serves as a valedictory tribute to its author, who was singular both as writer and personality. He will be warmly remembered and missed by his numerous admirers.

Internet warfare, part 1

Anyone armed with a keyboard, a modem and knowledge of the Internet's HTML language can be a participant in the Mideast conflict. For most people that means using legitimate Web sites, petitions and discussion areas to try to sway public opinion. Others are using sophisticated techniques to hack into computers, deface Web sites and disrupt the flow of data.



Today, a look at "cyberterrorism," "hacktivists" and the "Inter–fada."

According to WiredNews, in October 2000, when the Israeli-Palestinian cyberconflict moved into full swing, pro-Palestinian hackers defaced at least 40 Israeli sites including the Bank of Israel and Tel Aviv Stock Exchange, while Israeli antagonists marred 15 Palestinian sites. Analyst James Adams said the attacks between Palestinians and Israelis are "just a taste of things to come... Their weapon of choice, the laptop, is easily available, and the ammunition, viruses and hacking programs are free on the Internet." [http://www.wired.com/news/politics/0,1283,40030,00.html]

According to USA Today, the Israel Defence Forces, Knesset and Foreign Ministry Web sites have also been attacked, as has the Hezbollah site. [http://www.usatoday.com/life/cyber/tech/cti723.htm] It "was successfully penetrated by a hacker who replaced its blistering anti-Israel rhetoric with a rippling Israeli flag and a soundtrack of Hatikvah, the Israeli national anthem."

On another occasion, visitors expecting to reach the Hamas home page were diverted to a hard-core pornography site. [http://news.bbc.co.uk/hi/english/world/middle_east/newsid_1207000/1207551.stm]

WiredNews tells of a site that is distributing information and viruses to destroy Israeli Web sites. "Visitors to the site are greeted with the message, 'I swear that I will not use these programs on anyone but Jews and Israelis.' The site comes complete with a list of directions on how to use the attack tools." [http://www.wired.com/news/infostructure/0,1377,40449,00.html]

The FBI's National Infrastructure Protection Center (NIPC) monitors this kind of activity. It reported attacks on Palestinian- and Israeli-related Web sites in addition to one against the American-Israel Public Affairs Committee (AIPAC) that included theft of personal data, including credit card information. The NIPC site warned: "It is anticipated that as the conflict in the Middle East continues, the level and severity of cyber attacks being experienced may escalate and expand." [http://www.nipc.gov/warnings/advisories/2000/00-058.htm]

Although the Internet has always been a breeding ground for hate, the Simon Wiesenthal Center recently noted some disturbing trends in its report Digital Hate 2002. "The biggest difference now is that we're seeing more Web sites enlisting suicide bombers and those that validate or encourage terrorism and more games targeting minorities," said Rabbi Abraham Cooper, an associate dean of the centre. [http://whatpc.co.uk/News/1133360]

The conflict on the Internet takes some other interesting tactics. For example, let's say you want to find a site run by the Tanzim militia, the armed wing of Fatah, a faction of the Palestine Liberation Organization. You could go to the very popular search engine Google [http://google.com] and type in "Tanzim." You would be directed to Tanzim.net which appears to be run by the militia. [http://www.tanzim.net] But look closely and you will find the headline, "Pictures of our activities involved in mass killing" and an article titled "How to train Arab children to become martyrs." The site, clearly, is being produced by opponents of the Tanzim. I could not find an English language site run by the Tanzim themselves.

Next week, a look at online boycotts and the battle over Internet polling.

Bialik's growth grounded in commitment to Israel

By ANNA MORGAN
Staff Reporter

When Bialik Hebrew Day School opened its doors in 1961, the administration shared the building with the Labour Zionist Movement and the kids shared gym facilities with the Eitz Chaim School across the street.

Since then, the Labour Zionist Centre has moved to Codsell Avenue and the school has renovated several times to accommodate a growing student body. Bialik's recent groundbreaking indicates its plans to expand once more.

Initially, the Viewmount Avenue school was driven by the ideology of Poalei Zion, a left-wing worker's movement whose goal was "to spread Yiddish culture, open a separate Jewish school system and create trade unions."

According to Bialik's parent handbook, the movement was "both a political party and fraternal organization whose goal was the reconstruction of the Jewish people."

In Bialik's early years, there was a real commitment to the Labour Zionist ideology, said Nanette Rosen, a lawyer who was a student in one of Bialik's first classes.

"My mother, Dorothy, was a member of Shomer Hatzair [a socialist youth movement] in Poland before the war," Rosen said.

While Rosen went to Jewish camps associated with other political movements, a large percentage of her class belonged to the Shomer Hatzair youth group and went to their summer camps.

Back then, parents sent their kids to Bialik because they believed in the Labour Zionist movement's principles. They wanted compatibility between school and home values, Rosen said.

But times have changed, she said, noting that her son, Ethan, is a student at the school and her daughter, Elizabeth, attended Bialik until Grade 6.

"These days, there seems to be more of an emphasis on material things, but the school's commitment to Israel is still strong."

This past school year, Bialik's curriculum included many Israel-related projects including raising money for the Shai Lachayal (gifts for soldiers); the purchasing of close to 2,000 trees for the Jewish National Fund and collecting money to buy flowers in Israel for Shavuot for the families of the victims of terror.

In addition, the school runs an annual "Israel, I love you contest," between Yom Ha'atzmaut and Yom Yerushalayaim, principal Uri Korin said.

The final phase is done with a "JeopardIsrael" contest with out-of-town judges.

The point of these programs is to reinforce the school's current support for the Jewish state regardless of political affiliation, Korin explained, adding that it is also part of Bialik's agenda "to create a Jewish adult who is comfortable worldwide and who will support the workers of the world."

These days, changing demographics in the Jewish community and in the school's Forest Hill location have eliminated most signs of the "proletariat" from the Bialik community.

For Rosen, however, it was the school's approach to the teaching of Zionism that convinced her to send her children to that school. The teaching of Yiddish was also important to her.

"Yiddish is a way to teach children about their history and backgrounds," Rosen said, adding that since the school today is committed to Israel regardless of the government's political affiliation, all of Israel's communities should be reflected in the curriculum in order to help the students understand the country's complexities.

Changes have definitely occurred in the school over the years, Rosen said. When she was a student, the school wasn't kosher and the Bible and siddur were studied as a basis for literature, culture, philosophy and ethics.

"It made for very interesting discussions between the Bialik and Eitz Chaim students across the street," Rosen said.

Today, the parent handbook states that "all food brought for school events must be kosher."

The administration also encourages families not to schedule parties on Shabbat or Jewish holidays.

All in all, Rosen said, "I had a good experience there and learned a love of Israel and a sense of empowerment there."

"Many of my teachers were Israelis who had served in the army. They taught me a strong love of Israel. They led the way and taught us that we could make a difference."

Volunteers respond to terrorist attacks

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

The terror-related scenes from Israel have become all too familiar in recent months: wailing sirens, disoriented bystanders, blasted buses, killed or maimed victims and grieving family members.

Almost as familiar has become the sight of men in yellow flak jackets, armed with walkie-talkies and paramedic's supplies, who go about the business of aiding the injured.

Little known outside Israel, the volunteers are members of Zaka Rescue and Recovery, a grassroots organization founded in 1995 to respond to the increasing need of assistance at scenes of Palestinian terrorist bombings.

Zaka's 600 volunteers are all trained as paramedics and can offer life-saving assistance to those wounded in the blasts. They also provide a vital service to those past help, gathering up the bits of bone and flesh and blood as well as the intact limbs that may form the debris when a terrorist sets off a shrapnel-studded bomb in the midst of a crowd of civilians.

Yisroel Stefansky, a 23-year-old volunteer with Zaka, has attended at approximately 40 terrorist incidents since he joined the organization three years ago. Stefansky was in Toronto recently to meet members of the Jewish community, raise the profile of the Israeli organization and solicit financial aid for its work.

A yeshiva student who lives in Jerusalem, Stefansky talks about his work in the matter-of-fact tone of someone who has experienced the scenes of carnage too often. He admits that repeated exposure to horrible incidents has hardened him to some extent.

At his first terror scene, a bus bombing, "it was shocking, but I got into it pretty quick. I had not seen it before, that it could be so bad. You don't expect to see people without heads, people without limbs.

"At first it is shocking. Many people, Jews, were killed. You wonder how bad it will be. It's sadness, but there's nothing you can do. You just go in and clean up."

It's a gruesome task, but one which must be completed in order to comply with Jewish law.

"Every human being is created by God and when he passes away, everything has to be buried. Every piece of blood, every piece of flesh has to be buried. That's Jewish law," he said. "It's a very holy job and there are not too many people who can do it."

Burial is considered one of the highest of mitzvot – a religious obligation. But when high explosives are coupled with shrapnel, nails and bolts, often limbs are torn apart from bodies. Yet these too must be given a proper burial.

"We try to match up limbs to the body," Stefansky said. Occasionally DNA testing is used, but more often "it's very easy to match up" the limb and the body.

Those body fragments too small to be easily coupled with a torso are buried together in a mass grave.

Zaka is so diligent in its work that it even returns jewelry, such as wedding bands, to family members, he added.

The kind of work carried out by Zaka is clearly not for everyone. Although the rash of suicide bombings have prompted an outpouring of volunteers eager to help – the organization is now receiving inquiries from female volunteers – many don't last past their first or second incident, Stefansky said.

Even for those who grit their teeth and carry on, the emotional strain is wearing. Volunteers are offered psychological counselling on a bi-monthly basis to help them cope with the awful work they do.

At the day-long sessions, about 20 volunteers get together in a hotel conference room and talk about their experiences. It's not something they like to discuss with their families.

"They won't go home and tell their wife, 'I saw a baby without a head,'" he said.

"Therapy helps the volunteers with their nightmares. They talk it out."

The family of victims are also aided by Zaka, which keeps in touch with them, arranges counselling services and sends them food packages to help them celebrate Jewish holidays.

During his stay in Toronto, part of Stefansky's pitch was for help in raising funds for an expanded motorcycle unit. Zaka currently operates seven bikes and they are credited with saving 26 lives.

Designated volunteers constantly monitor police emergency channels and when they hear of an incident, they page or phone the volunteers to respond. The motorcycle units often get to the scene faster than regular ambulances, allowing Zaka paramedics to staunch a victim's bleeding and administer other life-saving aid.

Any funds raised in Canada, and from other supporters around the world, will go to motorcycles, ambulances, other rescue vehicles and medical equipment, like body bags and defibrillators. Zaka, Stefansky pointed out, also attends to any accident and fire scenes.

For more information, Zaka can be reached via e-mail at zakaunit@hotmail.com. Freelance journalist Marshall Shapiro, Zaka's liaison in Toronto, can be reached at 416-736-4436 or by e-mail at emmess@sympatico.ca.

Israelis camping in Ontario with mixed emotions

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

More than 20 Israeli students spending part of their summer at Ontario overnight camps are having mixed reactions to their experience.

"They're having a great time, but they're concerned about their family at home," says Howard Black, interim director of Camp Ramah, the camping arm of the Conservative movement of Judaism in Canada, located in Muskoka.

The campers, who are also at Camp Gesher, a Habonim Dror camp located north of Belleville; and Camp George, Canada's first Canadian camp in the Reform Jewish camping system, located near Parry Sound, have all been directly affected by terrorist activities in Israel.

Black said that two of his 13 Israeli campers, who were all funded by the Minto Foundation/Greenberg families of Ottawa, had been injured in a terrorist attack, while others had a parent or siblings who were killed, some as recently as six months ago.

All campers were chosen to attend camp after being interviewed and screened by an Israeli psychologist.

The Ramah campers, who are spending four weeks at Ramah, including a two-day trip to Niagara Falls and Toronto while the rest of camp has visitors' day, have found everyone welcoming and hospitable, Black said.

"They are missing their family, however, and they are concerned for their well-being," he said. "It is unusual for them to be away from home for a month so this is a long time, particularly given the matsav [situation]."

But they have no concerns about their own safety, he said. "The open large spaces are different and exciting for them, and they are having a vacation from their daily stresses of life. If this camp could be re-created as a secure utopia in Israel, it would be ideal. The only thing missing here, is that it is far away from home."

It's a good experience for everyone involved, Black said. "The Canadian campers are learning some Hebrew, and finding out firsthand about life in Israel. They have told me that they are anxious to find out what life in Israel is like on a daily basis.

"The Israeli campers are picking up some English and are getting to know Canadian campers. All in all, it's a mutual[ly] beneficial experience."

What is most important, he said, is that by hosting these campers, "we are showing the whole North American community how important Israel is to all of us in the Diaspora.

"We are intrinsically connected. All campers are alike, whether they are North American or Israeli."

The seven Israeli campers at Camp Gesher were brought over by Mishpachah Youth for Youth, a group in Israel that is dedicated to helping victims of violence, said Lorraine Levene, executive director of Na'amat Canada, Toronto, the adult arm of Habonim Dror.

David and Miriam Algam of Ottawa, helped raise funds and took responsibility for bringing over the campers.

One camper, who had lost his parents in a terrorist attack several years ago, recently lost his grandfather in another attack. "He speaks no English, yet he is participating in every activity. He has gotten right into camp routine," said Levene.

The camp has always had Israeli participants, she said, but this is the first year they are bringing over children who have been victims of violence.

"Israeli campers feel at home at Camp Gesher because it is run almost like a kibbutz. Everyone shares duties, all signs are in Hebrew, the Israeli flag flies high and programs are based on life in Israel.

"As well, about 50 per cent of our campers attend Hebrew day schools so they have enough Hebrew to communicate with the Israeli campers."

The Israelis were a bit homesick when they arrived, said Levene, but it took only a few days to become comfortable.

"Like every camp, she said, some campers are more enthusiastic than others, but all in all, they are enjoying themselves.

"To me, the positives are that they feel safe, they are learning English, they are laughing, they are playing and they are busy. They can't do anything like this at home because of their fears."

A remarkable return to Poland

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Fifty-nine years, six months and two days after the doomed Jewish citizens of Wierzbnik were taken to Treblinka, the granddaughter of the town's mohel found herself overwhelmed with emotion in a southeastern Polish municipality she'd only heard about.

On April 29, thousands of miles from her Toronto home with its Canadian flag outside, Reva Karstadt recited Kaddish and sang Israel's national anthem in the Wierzbnik Jewish cemetery.

Karstadt was accompanied by 39 other North Americans – all native Wierzbnikers or their descendants – as well as 190 Israeli students, the local Israeli chargé d'affaires, several Polish politicians, a rabbi from Kiev and a local priest. The Israelis brought Israeli soil to sprinkle on the graves.

One surreal image followed another.

"We were taken – I still can't believe it – by a Polish police escort to the Museum of Culture, and, if that wasn't enough, as we exited the bus, there at the top of the stairs a huge Israeli flag was flying beside the Polish one," recalled Karstadt in an interview around her dining room table with two other members of the trip's organizing committee.

Karstadt, 65, remembers that many years ago her parents were moved to tears by the sight of a Toronto police officer directing traffic, allowing them to cross the street safely on their way to shul. In Wierzbnik, they told her, Jews hid their Sabbath finery under old clothes to avoid being stoned.

But this spring in Wierzbnik, Jews were honoured guests, hobnobbing with local dignitaries in a series of ceremonial activities, including the dedication of a museum room commemorating the former Jewish community of Wierzbnik, which was annexed by Starachowice in 1939.

A visiting rabbi affixed a mezuzah, and members of a local family were designated Righteous Gentiles.

Among the tallitot, suitcases, photographs and Judaica on display in the room is a drum, found by the Jewish cemetery's caretaker, whom Karstadt affectionately refers to as "our starving artist." He recognized the significance of the musical instrument, whose top had been fashioned from a piece of the Torah.

The trip had its roots in a 1992 journey by lifelong friends Howard Chandler and Martin Baranek, who attended cheder together in Wierzbnik and survived the concentration camps separately as teenagers before settling in Toronto.

When the two men first visited the Jewish cemetery in Wierzbnik, they discovered it was "like a wild place, overgrown, and most of the matzevehs [gravestones] were toppled," recalled Chandler, who is president of Toronto's Wierzbniker Society.

They lobbied to save the century-old cemetery. Chandler even took the unusual step of approaching the local priest, who said he would call for a stop to desecration, noting that Catholic cemeteries were plagued by the same problems. The cemetery, which has been declared a historic site by the Polish government, is quite presentable now, Chandler said.

This year's gathering marked the first time since 1944 that there has been a minyan at the cemetery.

The new museum room was also a first, Karstadt said. "There wasn't a thing to show that Jews had ever lived there." A monument in the former Jewish market commemorates 16 Poles who were hanged there – but no Jews, she said.

But the visitors were not there to settle scores, Chandler stressed.

Along with Baranek and one other survivor, Chandler served as guide, historian and interpreter for the others, who ranged in age from their 20s to 70s. The trip also included stops in Warsaw, Krakow and a number of concentration camps.

Aside from the occasional example of graffiti, the group encountered no anti-Semitism, Chandler said. "We encountered nothing but goodwill."

Wierzbnik (pronounced Vyerzh-b'nik) was "a typical Jewish provincial shtetl," he said. Before the war, there were almost 4,000 Jews among its approximately 20,000 inhabitants. "There were industries, munitions factories and lumber mills. It attracted Jewish people – artisans, tradespeople. Everyone knew everyone."

Chandler's father sold flour and kitchen utensils. Baranek's father sold hardware and farm implements. Karstadt's grandfather, in addition to serving as mohel, had a distributorship for fine wines and spirits from France.

Although the town was small, Chandler said, there were "all kinds of Jewish organizations and schools. Everybody was observant, but some more than others."

The synagogue and its attached school were burned down as soon as the Germans entered Wierzbnik in 1939, he recalled. "I was 10. The synagogue had been renovated one or two years before the war. It was beautiful," he said.

Another long-gone building is the library where Karstadt's parents met. Her mother left in 1929 to join her then-fiancé, who had emigrated the year before. She was the only member of her family to leave, said Karstadt. Everyone else was wiped out.

Children with cancer get boost from POGO

By ADAM GRACHNIK
CJN Intern

Since 1983, the Pediatric Oncology Group of Ontario (POGO) has worked to provide better care, more research and increased government funding for children who have cancer.

As the principal adviser to the Ontario Ministry of Health, POGO is a collaboration representing the pediatric cancer programs in five Ontario hospitals, working with oncologists, nurses, health-care workers, patients, parents, survivors, caregivers and volunteers. It focuses on planning for provincial needs and co-ordinating the allocation of funds from the government.

The non-profit organization was founded to provide a voice for children's cancer control. However, Vanessa Melman Yakobson, POGO's development officer, says they "never really had a public face, and... we are really raising our profile."

A survivor of childhood cancer, she knows the importance of an organization such as POGO, and has dedicated herself to raising awareness and capital funding for the organization, which is clearly dear to her heart.

Since The CJN first wrote about the organization just over a year ago, POGO has continued to build on its strong roots and develop projects that seek to help all young cancer patients.

"[I am] proud that we have been able to expand in all areas. No one area has stayed still; [they] are all advancing," says POGO's executive director, Dr. Corin Greenberg.

Greenberg is referring to POGO's five main areas: care, research, education, database and fund-raising. Each has its own focus and requires significant levels of funding. While Greenberg jokingly talks about the book of accomplishments she could write, she points to three main achievements she is proud of.

POGO has implemented new after-care (previously known as late-effects or long-term follow up) clinics. Now that 70 per cent of children are surviving cancer, Greenberg says, clinics such as these are important to ensure that patients are seen regularly. This year, they have set up seven clinics and have a goal of increasing the number to 10 – two in each of POGO's main areas (Toronto, London, Hamilton, Kingston and Ottawa).

She also points to "a huge" step forward for POGO, which has secured $600,000 from the Ministry of Health to work with (Interlink community cancer nurses and enable the nurses to go into patients' homes and work directly with them.)

Finally, Greenberg says that out-of-pocket-costs, including parking, lodging, food and gas, are exorbitant for families of children with cancer. To combat these costs and to lessen the burden on these families, POGO has set up four satellite offices, which provide care closer to people's homes.

"Some families have a huge amount of travel to get the big centre for cancer care. We tried to figure out if there are parts that could be done close to home," she says.

This year, POGO established a clinic at Credit Valley Hospital in Mississauga, an addition to the clinics already in place in Kitchener-Waterloo, Orillia, Sudbury and Windsor.

POGO has also continued to work for research on childhood cancer. It raised the $2 million needed to set up the POGO Chair in Childhood Cancer Control at the University of Toronto – the first of its kind in Ontario. The first incumbent of the chair will be POGO's medical director, Dr. Mark Greenberg, who is senior oncologist at the Hospital for Sick Children and a 2002 recipient of the Order of Canada. POGO thus has a vision and a focus that will make it a leader in the research on pediatric oncology.

Melman Yakobson spearheaded the fund-raising campaign by combining creative ideas with business savvy. She has already raised an additional million dollars for research, and plans to augment the total to $4 million.

"It is challenging doing fund-raising when you're a small organization and raising awareness about POGO and pediatric cancer," she says.

"Fund-raising is in its infancy. The more money we get, the more the organization can do."

And Melman Yakobson has done a lot. In February she raised $60,000 at a gala and last month finished the third annual Party for POGO. She organized a family fun day at the beginning of June, sponsored by Nestle Canada and TD Commercial at Green Acres Day Camp.

"[It's] extremely exciting," she says. "[It's a] great challenge and [there is] so much stuff we can do."

Both women believe in the power of POGO and the service it provides.

"There are very few of us who have not sat on both sides of the bed. People are passionate about this place," says Greenberg.

Melman Yakobson agrees, drawing on the experience from when she herself was a 13-year-old with cancer.

"[It's] absolutely critical. Without POGO, you wouldn't have standards of care or ability for people in remote areas to be treated," she says, adding that the work she does is personally rewarding and that she knows that she is making a difference to families and children.

The organization is working on new projects and collaborations. For example, Greenberg says a plan is in the works to approach the government for help in subsidizing families for their out-of-pocket costs.

Melman Yakobson has ideas for more fund-raising ventures, but Greenberg stresses that "we [POGO] are very careful about not collecting private money for things that the government should be funding."

For more information or to help POGO, please call 416-592-1232 or visit the Web site at www.pogo.on.ca.

Intifadah hurting Weizmann Institute, president says

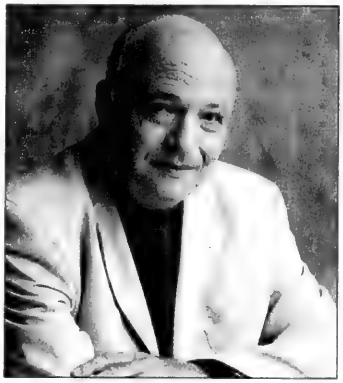
By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

The current Palestinian uprising has had a fiscal and academic impact on Israel's Weizmann Institute of Science, says its president.

And these problems, common to all Israeli universities, may yet worsen if the violence associated with the intifadah continues to flare, Ilan Chet warned in an interview.

As a result of the security situation, he explained, Israel has cut allocations to institutes of higher learning.

Funding to the Weizmann Institute decreased by three per cent this year, and may plummet by five per cent next year, said Chet, who is an award-winning scientist.



Ilan Chet

In recent years, the government has provided 47 per cent of the institute's $190 million (US) annual budget.

But due to pressing military needs necessitated by the intifadah, now in its 22nd month, Israel has had no alternative but to reduce the level of its financial support for universities.

In the face of this reality, the Weizmann Institute, based in Rehovot, will be dependent on overseas funds raised by its supporters more than in the past.

Chet, who succeeded Haim Harari as president last December, was in Toronto at the invitation of the Canadian Society for the Weizmann Institute of Science.

"It's his first hello to Canada since becoming president," said Sheri Federman, the society's director of programs and operations.

Apart from government cutbacks, the intifadah has engendered an anti-Israel backlash in the form of a budding boycott against Israeli scholars, Chet said.

Some foreign academics predisposed to the Palestinian cause refuse to share scientific material with their Israeli counterparts, he said.

"We've written hundreds of letters to colleagues in the United States and Europe asking them to separate politics from science. These letters have helped."

Chet added that university funding agencies outside Israel have not taken part in this boycott.

(The Associated Press reported recently that hundreds of European academics have called for a boycott of Israeli universities in protest over Israel's treatment of Palestinians.)

Much to his regret, the intifadah has also had a dampening effect on academic exchanges.

"International scientific conferences in Israel have dried up, and scientists have cancelled visits. On the other hand, some scientists have made a point of visiting us."

Joint projects between Israeli and Palestinian scientists are continuing, but in several cases meetings have taken place on neutral ground in Europe.

And, Chet said, foreign student enrollment at the Weizmann Institute, usually about 15 per cent of the student body, has been somewhat affected by the intifadah.

Chet, 62, was born in the port city of Haifa, and studied agriculture and microbiology at Hebrew University.

A member of Hebrew University's teaching staff for 30 years, he won the Israel Prize and the Wolf Prize for agricultural research in 1996 and 1998, respectively.

He was honoured for his research on biological control of plant diseases.

For the sake of its environment and water supply, Israel should stop using chemical pesticides, Chet said.

"The use of a lot of chemical fertilizers endangers Israel's drinking water supply, as well as the food chain."

Chet, Hebrew University's former dean of agriculture, said Israeli agriculture is among the most advanced in the world.

But due to Israel's dwindling water resources, its agricultural sector will eventually shrink.

"The water problem is very serious," he said, noting that Israeli farmers, within 10 to 15 years, will be using recycled rather than fresh water to nurture their crops.

With the water shortage in mind, Israeli agriculture must begin developing cash crops based on biotechnology.

Citing an example, he said, "There's no point for Israel just to grow tomatoes. Anyone can do it."

The challenge is to develop "clever" tomatoes that are resistant to disease, able to grow in brackish water and have a long shelf life.

Asked to compare Israeli agriculture with that of Arab countries, Chet, who has worked in Egypt and has friendly relations with Egypt's minister of agriculture, couched his reply in diplomatic language.

"Our Arab neighbours are progressing and learning new techniques, some transferred from Israel."

Fay Rotman appointed new Chair of Reena

The Board of Directors of Reena announce the appointment of Fay Rotman as Chair of Reena for 2002-2004.

Fay holds a Master of Social Work degree from the University of Toronto with a specialty in Social Policy, Planning and Administration. Since graduating in 1975, Fay has had a broad and varied career, both in the field of developmental services and as a fundraising professional.

For the past 21 years, Fay has worked as a freelance consultant, successfully providing support to a wide range of not-for-profit agencies in the areas of strategic planning, proposal development, program development and fundraising campaigns.

At the same time, she managed two associations; one a provincial association of professionals in developmental services; the other an association of 50 agencies in Toronto. These positions involved the support and motivation of professionals and volunteers in the organization of large scale events, advocacy with government, fund raising and coordinated planning.

Working with DVA Navion (a fund raising consulting firm) over the past 4 years, she directed a number of fund raising feasibility studies around the province.

Fay is married with two children who are currently attending university.

Reena is a non-profit social service agency dedicated to integrating individuals with developmental disabilities into all aspects of the community with dignity and respect.

Experiencing Israel isn't just a birthright

By ANNA MORGAN
Staff Reporter

JERUSALEM — These days, the Canada Israel Birthright Experience is much more than just a free trip to Israel.

Birthright is a way for Israel and the Diaspora to interact and help each other in times of need, Rabbi Michael Melchior told a Canada-Israel Experience group of 100 young adults at Kibbutz Ramat Rachel recently.

At a time when almost all tourism to Israel has shut down, Israelis are taking heart from the fact that Birthright kids are still coming, the deputy foreign minister and chair of the Birthright Steering Committee told the group.

"Knowing that you are willing to come here when Israel is hurting, bleeding and even crying, has taken some of the cynicism out of Israelis."

Birthright is about people being together and caring about each other when it means the most, Rabbi Melchior said.

The program, which represents a three-way partnership between the State of Israel, philanthropists Charles Bronfman and Michael Steinhardt, and Diaspora community organizations, offers a free trip to Israel to young adults between 18 and 26 in order to strengthen ties between Jews around the world.

As the three buses of Canadians from Montreal, Toronto, Winnipeg and communities from coast to coast made their way across Israel last week, the kids barely noticed the increased security which was planned around their every move.

The participants have very little free time, said the director of the Israel Experience program Lorne Klemensberg, adding that the buses are tracked on a global positioning system so that every minute of the schedule is accounted for. In addition, two guards are with each bus all the time.

The lack of free time allows for little interaction between Canadians and Israelis. Therefore, 26 female officer candidates and eight Israelis from the Israel Defence Forces are placed on the buses, Birthright assistant director Asher Afriat said.

This integration allows participants to experience the trip from the Israeli perspective as well as from the viewpoint of the Diaspora, Afriat said.

For Prof. Asaf Zohar, the Canada- Israel Experience scholar-in-residence, the challenge is to develop a program that teaches about Israel from all perspectives so that the students will have the tools to deal with the Arab propaganda they're exposed to on campuses at home.

Because things change very quickly in Israel, it is important for participants to stay involved when they get home, Zohar said.

Over the past year, Birthright has made several changes in order to deal not only with the current crises, but with the changing nature of the Israel-Diaspora relationship.

For example, students from Poland participated for the first time, and Argentinian students held a ceremony on Mt. Herzl National Cemetery to commemorate the 1994 bombing of the Jewish community building in Buenos Aires.

Now is the time for Jews from around the world to come to Israel and stand tall, said participant Elona Rubinov, who was born in Uzbekistan but grew up in a Conservative home in Toronto.

"My friends thought I was crazy for coming to Israel now," said Winnipegian David James Rittberg.

But he said it was important for him to somehow get reconnected to the community and Birthright offered him that opportunity.

Talya Fuchs, an Israeli/Canadian who now lives in Vancouver, said it meant a lot to her to experience Israel with kids who were never here before.

Torontonian Marty Sussman said this trip was the "most inspiring experience" of her life.

"I've never been so proud to call myself a Jew. I feel as if I've come home," she said.

And for Shai Yanovski, one of the Israelis on the bus, the experience allowed him to really get to know Canadians.

"I just can't believe how polite everyone is," Yanovski said.

זה עתה סיים שאול מופז את כהונתו כרמטכ"ל, והמראיינים חזכירו לו שחוא נחשב לרמטכ"ל הכי פוליטי שהיה עד היום. ענה להם מופז:

אלה שהסכימו עם דיעותיי אמרו שהן מאוד מקצועיות, ואלה שהתנגדו להן- כינו אותן פוליטיות.

Y TU MAMA

מעבר לעלילה המרכזית מצליח הבמאי להראות את הנוף האנושי העני והמדכא של מקסיקו מנקודת ראות שלא ראיתי כמותה עד היום. סרט מעורר מחשבה ומאוד אסתטי. שמוחה וחצי בסולם קורן. רוצה: (או קיי, אולי לא לרוץ אבל ללכת מהר).

LATE MARRIAGE

CIC lauds Amnesty report condemning Palestinian 'crimes against humanity'

By DAVID LAZARUS
Staff Reporter

Despite "problematic" elements, Amnesty International's recent report condemning Palestinian attacks on Israeli civilians as crimes against humanity could mark a "turning point" in Amnesty's relationship with Israel, the Canada-Israel Committee (CIC) says.

In a statement responding to the Amnesty report, the CIC said it is a "generally factual assessment" and that the human rights organization "has broken new ground in condemning these attacks and systematically discrediting each justification provided by militant Palestinian groups for their actions."

"[T]he readiness of the authors to reject all attempts by Palestinian spokespeople and their international supporters to rationalize and explain attacks against Israeli civilians... is an important reflection of reality and, as such, might mark the first step by [Amnesty] to ameliorate widespread concern about its treatment of Israel."

The CIC said the Amnesty report marked a welcome and "significant" departure from Amnesty's historical animus toward Israel.

Amnesty "has long been among the most vigorous critics of Israeli policies and practices in the territories often providing disproportionate and unfair attention to alleged human rights violations against Palestinians," the CIC noted.

The CIC's director of research and education, David Goldberg, said the Amnesty report marks the first time the group "takes real significant scrutiny of the [Palestinian Authority] itself in terms of its own human rights record.

"In the past Amnesty International has found ways to ignore [Palestinian terror attacks] or excuse them. This time, it didn't fall into that trap."

The Amnesty report, titled Without Distinction: attacks on civilians by Palestinian armed groups, called the attacks "murder" and "crimes against humanity under international law."

Released earlier this month, it condemns attacks against civilians in both Israel and the West Bank and Gaza. It also calls on leaders of groups such as Hamas and Islamic Jihad to stop the attacks, which Amnesty says have killed 350 Israeli civilians since September 2000.

The report, Amnesty's most in-depth condemnation of Palestinian violence in the current conflict, said "no violations [of human rights] by the Israeli government, no matter the scale or gravity" justify the killing of civilians.

Ilan Feldman, a spokesperson for Amnesty's Israeli branch, told the Jerusalem Post that although the group has issued several press releases against Palestinian attacks and has expressed condemnation after every one, this report "analyzes certain Palestinian organizations and their crimes against humanity. That is why it is unique."

Despite being encouraged overall by the Amnesty report, the CIC singled out several "substantive" problems with it.

The most "glaring," the CIC said, was Amnesty's refusal to use the term "terrorism" because there is no agreed-upon international definition of the word.

This, the CIC said, "comes across as a cop-out" in light of the U.S. State Department's definition of terrorism as "premeditated politically-motivated violence perpetrated against non-combatant targets by subnational groups or clandestine agents, usually intended to influence an audience."

The CIC also takes issue with the report's "disproportionate attention" to Palestinian accusations against settlement activity," which the CIC said gives "undue credibility" to arguments by Palestinian militants that Israelis living in the territories are not "civilians."

The CIC also asked whether the report's exclusive focus on attacks against Israeli civilians means that Amnesty "considers attacks on Israeli soldiers to be less morally reprehensible?

"Amnesty International cannot have it both ways," the CIC said. "It cannot condemn some Palestinian terrorist attacks against some Israelis while rationalizing or excusing others."

The CIC also said the Amnesty report "hesitates" to blame Palestinian Authority (PA) President Yasser Arafat personally for the terror against civilians, even though it says attacks by "armed groups" are committed with the tacit, if not explicit, approval of the PA.

"The apparent attempt by Amnesty International to isolate Arafat from criticism of the Palestinian terrorist groups and the culture of anti-Israel hatred prevailing in the West Bank and Gaza Strip that permits them to operate betrays reality and suggests the disquieting intervention of partisan political considerations in the report's preparation," the CIC said.

Palestinian officials have rejected the Amnesty report as biased and unbalanced.

PA cabinet secretary Ahmed Abdul Rahman noted that Palestinian leaders and moderates have condemned suicide bombings. He added that "all that is happening to Israeli citizens is a normal consequence of their occupation and rejection of Palestinian rights."

As well, leaders of such groups as Hamas and Islamic Jihad have vowed to continue attacks on Israeli civilians.

The CIC, however, was pleased that the Amnesty report countered, one by one, Palestinian rationalizations for attacks on civilians.

For example, Amnesty said the fact that Israeli society is, in a sense, "militarized" by the presence of soldiers everywhere is no defence for attacks on civilians.

"The occasional presence of soldiers among passengers on ordinary commuter buses, diners in a café or shoppers in a market does not make such venues legitimate targets for attack," the Amnesty report said.

It also sees no moral equivalence between the deliberate targeting of Israeli civilians and the accidental deaths of Palestinians.

"It is... necessary to draw a fundamental distinction between Palestinians deliberately targeting Israeli civilians, including children, for attack, and the accidental deaths of Palestinian civilians in the course of Israeli retaliatory strikes, for which the prime minister of Israel offers immediate regret," the Amnesty report said.

Iran paid Menem $10 m. to cover-up bombing: New York Times

Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd

NEW YORK — Former Argentinian president Carlos Menem received a $10-million bribe from the Iranian government, in exchange for his silence over the country's role in the 1994 bombing of a Buenos Aries Jewish centre that killed 85 people, according to a report published Monday in the New York Times.

Carlos Menem

The paper claims to have obtained a copy of the sealed testimony of a witness in the investigation into the case, the worst in Argentinian history. Those responsible for the attack have still not been apprehended.

According to the Times, an Argentinian official involved in the investigation, frustrated by the lack of progress in the case, provided 100 pages of sealed transcript, which appear to support the long-held suspicion of Iranian involvement.

The report comes ahead of a December primary ballot that will pick candidates for Argentina's presidential election next year.

Although officials considered a possible Iranian connection early in the investigation, Iran has repeatedly denied such charges and few leads have been reported in the years since.

Menem, still an influential figure in the Peronist party system, is considered a leading presidential contender for a third term. He governed Argentina from 1989 to 1999.

Menem's former chief of staff, now a key campaign adviser, denied the allegations in the report, calling them politically motivated.

"Every intelligence agency in the world had free passage in Argentina to investigate this case," Alberto Kohan told the newspaper. "We would all like to know who did it."

In addition to the 85 people killed, more than 200 were injured in the July 18, 1994 car bomb attack on the Jewish Community Cultural Centre, one of two such attacks in Buenos Aires in the early 1990s. In March 1992, a blast destroyed the Israeli Embassy, killing 28 people. Jewish leaders have criticized authorities for failing to apprehend those responsible.

An Iranian defector to Germany identified as Abdolghassem Mesbahi asserts in the 100-page transcript of a secret deposition that planning for the attack on the community centre was led and supervised by officials inside Iran's intelligence agency and its embassy in Buenos Aires.

Mesbahi alleges that Menem received a $10-million deposit into a numbered account to "make declarations that there was no evidence against Iran that it was responsible," the newspaper reported.

In his testimony, Mesbahi said Menem benefited for years from his ties to Iranian intelligence officials, the newspaper reported. They courted him because of his political power, Muslim ancestry and connections to Argentina's small but influential Syrian-Lebanese community, he said.

U.S. and South American authorities have long warned that the so-called "Triple Border" region, where Argentina, Brazil and Paraguay meet, could make an appealing harbour for terrorists because of its porous borders, its concentration of Arab-Muslim immigrants and lax passport controls.

Last year, the U.S. State Department warned in its annual report on global terrorism that the region — already known as South America's contraband capital — "remained a focal point for Islamic extremism in Latin America."

Last Thursday, 5,000 people commemorated the eighth anniversary of the bombing with a candlelight vigil where some complained that another year had gone by with no new leads. Government officials deny any cover up, saying they conducted a proper investigation.

"The case remains unsolved and we still have no answers. We demand justice and we demand it now," said Abraham Kahul, president of the Jewish Community Cultural Centre.

Fifteen former police officers have been arrested, accused of having indirect roles in the bombing. They are accused of co-operating with those responsible for the bombing.

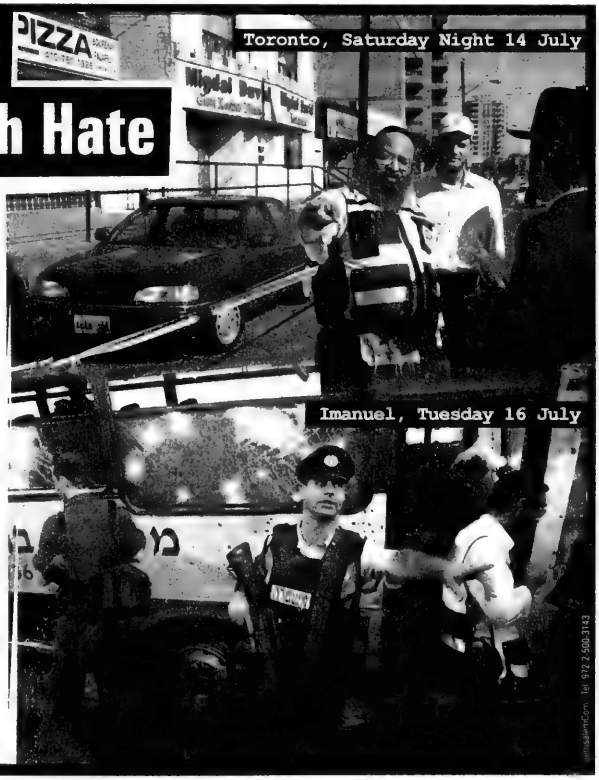
Came Face-to-Face With Hate



Israel's Citizens Face That Hate – and Bloodshed – Almost Every Single Day

Shock, grief, horror – those are the emotions many of us experienced after hearing of the cold-blooded murder of David Rosenzweig.

These are the same emotions many Israelis have felt almost every day for the last two years. Terror attacks have become regular occurrences – as has burying the dead and assisting the wounded.

Zaka is a rapid-response organization that rushes to the scene every time terror strikes. Its 600 volunteers provide emergency first aid and recover and identify victims, often at great personal risk.

In these trying times, Zaka – and the people of Israel – need our support.

New IDF chief of staff: no legitimacy to Arafat

By ZE'EV SCHIFF
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

More than anyone else, the new chief of staff of the Israel Defence Forces (IDF), Moshe Ya'alon, is a symbol of the ongoing campaign to deny political legitimacy to Palestinian Authority President Yasser Arafat. Unlike his predecessor, Shaul Mofaz, Ya'alon doesn't seek Arafat's physical expulsion, only his political departure. His campaign began in the days when Yitzhak Rabin was prime minister and Ya'alon was head of military intelligence, and continued through Ehud Barak's term as prime minister, up to U.S. President George W. Bush's recent speech calling for new Palestinian leadership.

After he became convinced in 1995 that Arafat had given a green light to continue the use of terror and that Hamas' operatives were Arafat's proxies for attacks, Ya'alon demanded Rabin pose an ultimatum to Arafat. Rabin agreed, but first allowed Ya'alon, in October 1995, to present the proof Israel had, while the ultimatum itself, they agreed, would be presented to Arafat before the elections, in January 1996. But Rabin was assassinated in November 1995.

Ya'alon did not give up, nor did he refrain from quiet criticism of Foreign Minister Shimon Peres, or Barak (who ordered that the army not condemn Arafat), or Prime Minister Ariel Sharon for allowing his son Omri to meet with Arafat while the PA leader continued supporting terrorism.

Ya'alon adheres to the principle that those who use violence should not be allowed to gain from it. He accepts the existence of a Palestinian state, but under clear conditions and at the end of a negotiation for a final settlement. If that condition is not met, he believes, it's a formula for continued warfare and for negative processes in the Arab world, including Israel's Arabs. He knows Arafat's departure from the political arena does not mean a knockout victory for Israel. Moreover, he knows that good military tactics are not enough to stop the bloodshed. Therefore, Ya'alon does not want the IDF to linger in Palestinian towns and he supports wide-scale humanitarian aid to the population.

Ya'alon does not shy away from talking about "shortening the lines" in the territories, by which he means withdrawing from isolated settlements – but not now. It's clear to him that at the tactical and operational level, it's better to group the settlements into blocs.

Since he perceives the Palestinian terror campaign to be an existential one, Ya'alon led the IDF's campaign against the refuseniks, in its public relations and legal aspects, and he appears to have succeeded. After all, there are only six refuseniks now in prison.

The treasury, which has grown used to obstructing practically every construction and development project in the country, will not have an easy time with him when they discuss the new security separation between Israelis and Palestinians. Ya'alon will want more troops for the army, more new electronics and more top-notch infantry units. He explains that nobody has tried to cross the fence along the Lebanese border, which is backed up with a thicket of electronics, and terrorists will continue their efforts to cross the fence now under construction.

He is cautious about the Syrians, but the caution is conditional. His approach is derived from the priority he gives the Palestinian front. He is not interested in hurting the Syrians, only in driving the Iranian influence – which is already appearing in Jordan and Egypt – out of Lebanon. He supports more political and economic pressure on Damascus, but faced with no alternative, will back military pressure – and then insist that Syrian leader Bashar Assad pay the price. That is certain, given the primary importance Ya'alon places on Israel's deterrent capabilities.

Moshe Ya'alon receives the insignias of his new position from Prime Minister Ariel Sharon and Defence Minister Benjamin Ben-Eliezer. [Israel Sun photo]

Ya'alon will try to avoid any conflicts with political leaders. He learned from Mofaz's experience. But that doesn't mean there won't be occasional glitches. There were in the past with him, already back in the days when he was head of military intelligence, and there certainly will be in the future – but not exchanges of personal barbs.

In his first appearance before the Knesset Foreign Affairs and Defence Committee, Ya'alon said last Tuesday that "the Palestinians, like Hezbollah, are trying by any means possible to undermine the endurance of Israeli society. They view Israel as an opulent society rather than one prepared to fight and sustain losses."

Ya'alon said this thinking has permeated deep into the Palestinian public and leadership, who view incidents such as the IDF's withdrawal from Lebanon and the intifadah in the territories as an achievement. According to Ya'alon, it is important that the fight against terror end in a manner that will make it clear to the Palestinians that they have failed to accomplish anything through terror and violence.

PA proposes its forces take over as IDF withdraws

By ALUF BENN
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Palestinian Authority (PA) Interior Minister Abdel Razek Yehiyeh has presented Israel with a security plan meant to end the violence, including returning to civic order and taking control of the Palestinian security forces in the territories.

His plan emphasizes the need for a change in the public atmosphere, with a campaign against violence, intended to fight terror. He believes that force alone is not enough to defeat terrorism.

Yehiyeh presented the plan at a security meeting last Saturday night in Tel Aviv between an Israeli team, headed by Foreign Minister Shimon Peres, and a PA team, headed by Minister Saeb Erekat. Yehiyeh's plan is similar to plans presented in the past, such as the George Tenet plan and a Peres-Arafat plan worked out on Yom Kippur eve last year at the Dahaniyeh airport. Neither was ever implemented.

According to the Palestinian presentation, Israel will begin withdrawing from PA areas back to positions it held before the outbreak of violence on Sept. 28, 2000, and will lift the closures and curfews. Palestinian forces, subordinate to the PA Interior Ministry – meaning Yehiyeh himself – will fill the vacuum created, in exchange for an Israeli guarantee not to target the PA's security forces.

With the withdrawal, the Palestinians are ready to resume security co-ordination with Israel along the lines drawn up in the 1998 Wye agreement, to confiscate illegal weapons and to arrest those who break Palestinian law. In exchange, the PA wants Israel to free prisoners arrested during the conflict, cease attacking targets in the territories and end the assassination campaign against terrorists. Yehiyeh proposes working for a change in public attitude and against encouragement of violence, and asks the Israeli side to cease incitement against Palestinians.

Yehiyeh's plan has been passed on to others in the political echelon in Jerusalem and to the defence establishment. But a senior government source said last night that "even if Yehiyeh means well, it's doubtful he'll be able to deliver the goods and prevent terror."

The Palestinian team said the situation in the territories is a result of the Israeli occupation, which helps Hamas and Islamic Jihad recruit youths. They asked Israel to allow the PA forces to move freely in the territories and said that even if they cannot guarantee 100 per cent results, they want to make the effort. They pointed out that the IDF operation has not managed to eliminate the terrorism either.

There are differing versions from the Israeli team. Peres called Danish foreign minister Per Styg Moeller, the current president of the European Union, to brief him on the meeting with the Palestinians. "Wherever the Palestinians can take security responsibility and guarantee quiet, we'll leave," Peres said. At the first stage, Israel is proposing "Judea first," meaning Jericho, Bethlehem and Hebron as test cases, because they are quieter than the northern West Bank.

But another senior source said nobody offered the Palestinians an Israeli withdrawal. "They were told we will start easing economic conditions in Gaza and Judea, in areas like curfews, closures, freedom of movement," he said.

Erekat and his colleagues preferred that Israel quit Ramallah first, explaining that it is the Palestinian seat of government in the West Bank, and this would make it easier for the PA to take action against the terror groups.

Peres promised to look into that possibility, but both sides know that Erekat's request results from Palestinian frustration over Yasser Arafat's isolation in Ramallah. The Palestinians made it clear from the outset that they were there on behalf of the PA chairman.

Peres was accompanied by hawkish minister Danny Naveh, appointed by Sharon to accompany Peres, as Naveh said, "to make sure no political negotiations take place under fire."

Peres reiterated that the terror and suicide bombings must stop and that they are the main obstacle to improving conditions. "Terror is eliminating your future; the Hamas, Islamic Jihad and Popular Front are finishing you," he said. Naveh focused on the Tanzim as the main terrorist group.

ME scientists come together

The idea of setting up a synchrotron accelerator was first raised at a meeting of Middle East physicists in Torino, Italy in 1997. Germany was about to end work on its BESSY-1 synchrotron project and suggested donating the accelerator to a Middle East peace project.

"At that time the situation was already volatile and [Benjamin] Netanyahu was in power. That's why we met in Torino and not in the Middle East," says Professor Eliezer Rabinovici, a Hebrew University physicist who attended the Torino meeting and now sits on the international board of SESAME.

However, Rabinovici says, despite the ups and downs in relations between Israel and its neighbours, "at meetings, we managed to talk about physics and to promote the project. Delays in the project were caused mainly by economic factors rather than political ones.

"It's like being in a parallel universe," says Rabinovici of the scientists' last meeting, which was held in Paris.

"As a physicist I always dreamed of parallel universes, but here it's materializing," he added.

The cornerstone laying ceremony for the project is scheduled for December in Jordan. The accelerator is to be upgraded and will double its energy source.

The project is under the auspices of the United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization (UNESCO).

The SESAME council members are: Bahrain, Egypt, Greece, Iran, Israel, Jordan, Morocco, Oman, Pakistan, the Palestinian Authority, Turkey, and the United Arab Emirates. Observer countries include Armenia, France, Germany, Italy, Japan, Kuwait, Russia, Sweden, Sudan, the UK, and the United States, and several other countries have expressed interest in joining.

'Protecting minorities Jewish responsibility'

By ANNA MORGAN
Staff Reporter

JERUSALEM — Israel's former ambassador to the United Nations, Abba Eban, once said it is a miracle that Israel remains a true democracy in the Middle East.

However, "it demands work to keep Israel a democracy," Rabbi Michael Melchior warned a Canada Israel Experience group of Birthright participants.

In an emotional speech in Jerusalem on July 10 to more than 100 young Canadians, Israel's deputy foreign minister discussed the many dilemmas facing the country today.

Israel must provide equal rights for Jews and non-Jews, not only because Israel is a democracy, but because it's a Jewish state, Rabbi Melchior said.

Two thousand years of exile taught the Jewish people the importance of being sensitive to the needs of minorities, he said, noting that the root of the Hebrew word for responsibility, achrayut, is acher, meaning other.

God judges Jews by how we relate to "the other, the weaker, the minority, the stranger."

If Israel is going to continue to be a democratic Jewish state, the Palestinian conflict must be resolved, Rabbi Melchior said.

U.S. President George W. Bush's dream of a democratic Palestinian state in Judea, Samaria and Gaza next to the State of Israel is a good one, he said, adding that if Israel wants to continue being a democratic Jewish state,"we have to get there.

"And those that tell you that there are other options – that we can be in Judea and Samaria and have all the settlements and at the same time have peace and a democratic state – are lying."

Those that offer this solution are suggesting that Israel become a fascist country, Rabbi Melchior said.

Referring to an Israeli cabinet bill that passed first reading this month, which would have barred Israeli Arabs from buying state-owned land, Rabbi Melchior said unequivocally that the bill is a disgrace and must never become law.

"This bill will put us on a slippery slope towards racism and is totally unacceptable," he said.

(The bill has since been withdrawn and sent to committee for study.)

Speaking about religious pluralism, Rabbi Melchior emphasized the need for Israel to accommodate all Jewish points of view.

"It's crazy for the Knesset to think that it can pass religious legislation. It doesn't bring one person closer to the Almighty… It makes people run away from religion."

Rabbi Melchior told the Birthright participants that to be Jewish today is to understand and discuss the dilemmas of the Jewish world and the State of Israel.

"It's important to go home and get involved," he said.

Canadians have been good friends of Israel, the deputy foreign minister said, adding that Canada's minister of foreign affairs, Bill Graham, should get credit for supporting Israel.

Rabbi Melchior noted that even though it has upset the Europeans, Graham has voted on behalf of Israel at various meetings this year at the UN Human Rights Commission.

"Bill Graham is a real friend of Israel."

The deputy foreign minister went on to discuss the importance of continuing discussions with the Arab world, even if its leadership is not up to the challenge.

In the pursuit of peace, he said, Israeli officials are currently meeting with Sunni Muslim leaders in Alexandria, Egypt in an attempt to change attitudes in the Arab world.

He said that 3½ million Palestinians are suffering because of the terrorism of their fellow citizens, but it is still Israel's responsibility to help them by pursuing peace, he said.

"Not because we're democrats, but because we're Jewish."

The government is not doing enough when is comes to humanitarian aid for the Palestinians and needs to do more, he said, adding that Israel is working toward that end.

Rabbi Melchior said the ongoing terrorism against Israel "doesn't make Israelis give up. And that's important. It doesn't make us give up the desire to make peace even with those who are sending the suicide bombers.

"There is no alternative to the vision of peace. We are in the Middle East and must work it out with the peoples around us. We have no choice."

Jenin: Rumours ran rampant

By ZE'EV SCHIFF
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

Commentary

What was the spark that set off the rumours about a massacre in Jenin's refugee camp? It's been weeks since the controversy broke out during the hard battle the Israel Defence Forces conducted there during Operation Defensive Shield, and now two stories have come up that could perhaps shed some light on how the rumours spread.

At one point during the fighting, the army used loudspeakers to call on all Palestinian men between the ages of 16 and 50 to turn themselves in. Many came out and were sent to Kafr Salem for questioning. Some of those questioned were sent for further questioning to Shin Bet facilities, while the rest were not allowed to go back to the city, where the battle continued. They were transferred to mosques in the villages of Rumna and Zabuba and the northern West Bank. Their families did not receive word from them or about them, and rumours began to fly that they had been executed.

At the same time, another story developed. Toward the end of the fighting, the army sent three large refrigerator trucks into the city. Reservists decided to sleep in them for their air conditioning. Some Palestinians saw dozens of covered bodies lying in the trucks and rumours spread the Jews had filled trucks full of Palestinian bodies.

Some Palestinians went to the civil administration to ask about it. When it turned out the rumors of executions were baseless, the myth of the Jenin massacre evaporated. But Palestinian Minister Saeb Erekat continued lying, though he lowered the number of dead from 3,000 to 500. At the same time the Arab and European media began writing about a massacre. Some described monstrous Israeli war crimes that Israel was trying to cover up for two weeks. Others compared Israel to Al Qaeda and the Taliban. None has since retracted the mendacious claims nor tried to find out how they were misled.

Many of these details came out during a conference held by the Jaffee Center for Strategic Studies on Israel's media strategies, with the Jenin episode used as an example. Lt. Col. Fuad Halhal of Shfaram described his placement as the civil administration officer in Jenin (earlier he had been in Tul Karm and Hebron). He illustrated his talk with photographs, including photos of meetings he had had with International Red Cross and Red Crescent representatives, who were surprised to see the pictures after they claimed the meetings never took place.

After 13 soldiers were killed in Jenin, some soldiers became quick with the trigger. Nonetheless, even during the combat and explosions, the IDF made efforts to assist the civilian population, including supplying food, oxygen canisters and an Israeli generator to the Palestinian hospital, the transfer of 83 patients from that hospital to Israeli hospitals, sending technicians from the Jerusalem Electric Company to repair damaged lines in Jenin, as well as drinking water pipes and a well that ceased to function. This was all documented, and sometimes photographed, by Lt.-Col. Halhal.

But a representative from the Foreign Ministry, Gideon Meir, said he was hearing all this for the first time. During the fighting, he said, none of this information reached the communications department he heads at the Foreign Ministry.

That fact is also mentioned in a report issued by the Jaffee Center. Despite years of preaching to the army that it has to change its basic assessments to deal with public relations as an element as critical as the weather, enemy positions or topography, it has not yet been done. The case of the Jenin massacre that never was is a good example of the mud that can stick to Israel even when it wins the battle after suffering many casualties.

Film explores dilemma of Orthodox gays and lesbians

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

"How can you be queer and Orthodox?"

This provocative question, posed by David, a 58-year-old observant Jew whose homosexuality has alienated his family, is at the heart and soul of Sandi Simcha DuBowski's sensitive and revealing film Trembling Before G-D.

The film, which opened last Friday at the Elton and Canada Square theatres, charts new ground as the first to examine the tense relationship between gays and lesbians and the Chassidic and Orthodox communities.

Jewish gays and lesbians, whose numbers are probably greater than is generally believed, face a fundamental dilemma: How can they reconcile their commitment to Judaism with the biblical prohibitions that forbid such sexual behaviour?

In truth, they cannot, at least in the mainstream Chassidic/Orthodox communities, as this film vividly and sadly shows.

Two Orthodox rabbis, Aharon Feldman and Shlomo Riskin, make that quite clear. You cannot be a religious Jew and violate the immutable laws of Judaism, observes Rabbi Feldman.

Rabbi Riskin, though basically in agreement with this position, is slightly more empathetic. Homosexuality, he claims, cannot foster "normal Jewish family life." And yet, he adds, homosexuals – and presumably lesbians – must be loved and helped.

Rabbi Steve Greenberg, the first openly gay Orthodox rabbi and a graduate of Yeshiva University, gives a compelling counterpoint to their strictures.

Despite Rabbi Riskin's plea for empathy, gays and lesbians are largely shunned, even disowned in some extreme cases, by their fellow Orthodox Jews.

Driven by pressure to fit in, some gays live double lives, like the Marranos of old. On the surface, they carry on as married men and women. But inside, they smoulder, finding it increasingly difficult to function normally.

DuBowski, whose 84-minute film is set in Brooklyn, Los Angeles, Miami, San Francisco, London and Jerusalem, introduces us to a number of tormented souls.

One 56-year-old man in the film is the father of 12 children. Nonetheless, he does not enjoy having sex with his wife. And because she is painfully aware of his aversion to physical contact, and of his preference for boys, she has slipped into a depression.

Devorah, a haredi Jew, is a mother. But as a closet lesbian, she can no longer respond to her husband's sexual needs. To save the marriage, she proposes a platonic relationship.

The twin leitmotifs running through Trembling Before G-D are grief and rejection.

Take the case of David, the son of a cantor. A modern Orthodox Jew living in Los Angeles, David attempted to conquer his homosexuality. On the advice of a rabbi, he submitted to a "cure," eating figs and reciting a certain set of prayers, but to no avail. Another rabbi advised him to bite his tongue whenever he felt an attraction to a man, but this tactic was equally futile.

To escape the disapproval of parents and peers, David moved out of his Orthodox neighbourhood and avoided kosher restaurants and synagogues.

In an emotional scene, he has a reunion with a Lubavitch rabbi who steered him toward "therapy" 20 years earlier. Confessing that he cannot buck his homosexuality, David asks the rabbi for his view.

The answer: better to be celibate and put up with a loveless existence than to be an active gay. This is not what David wants to hear.

Malka and Leah

The poignant situation of gays in the Orthodox community is further underscored by an assortment of other interviews.

Malka and Leah, who became sweethearts at a girls' seminary and have been together for 12 years, worry that they will not have a place in "the next world."

Michelle, who grew up in the Chassidic enclave of Boro Park, was married and is now divorced. "I feel like I'm an outsider," she says. "There is no place for me there."

Mark, the son of a haredi rabbi in Britain, "came out" in Israel after being sent there for "rehabilitation." Since then, Mark has been ejected from seven yeshivas for homosexual activity. However, Mark has found companionship among gay Orthodox men like himself, some of whom belong to newly founded support groups and networks.

As Trembling Before G-D suggests, the issue is currently the subject of lively discussion in Orthodox circles. This film will surely contribute to this important and evolving debate.

Reissued Richler collection captures an era

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

St. Urbain Street is not just another street in Montreal. From the 1920s to the early 1950s, it was virtually the centre of the universe for many immigrant Jews slowly adjusting to Canada.

Mordecai Richler, the novelist who died last year, grew up on St. Urbain Street. To no one's surprise, he incorporated memories of it into his books, ranging from St. Urbain's Horseman to Joshua Then and Now.

The Street, a collection of his journalism and stories, was originally published in book form in 1969. In honour of his memory, Penguin Books has reissued The Street. It consists of 11 pieces – all dealing, directly or glancingly, with that gritty thoroughfare on the periphery of bucolic Mount Royal.

A curmudgeon in print and in person, he has mixed recollections of St. Urbain Street, to say the least. Some of his observations, in fact, are coloured by the rampant prejudice and provincialism of the era.

He recalls the old, underpaid parochial school teachers who would twist ears and rap knuckles, and the public school teacher who initiated first-year students with a cute joke permeated by anti-Semitism.

Richler's Galician-born grandfather, who settled in Montreal in 1904, had intended to immigrate to the United States. Fate, however, intervened. As Richler puts it:

"My grandfather, I was astonished to discover many years later, had actually had a train ticket to Chicago in his pocket. Canada was not a choice, but an accident. On board ship my grandfather encountered a follower of the same hasidic rabbi; the man had a train ticket to Montreal, but relatives in Chicago. My grandfather knew somebody's cousin in Toronto... So the two men swapped train tickets..."

There were plenty of characters on St. Urbain, and one of them was a person who ran for alderman on a one-plank platform: "provincial speed cops were anti-Semites."

Then there was the baker who baked a challah for Queen Elizabeth's birthday and received a thank-you note in return. "For local distribution," she told reporters, "we also bake knishes and cater for quality weddings."

During Richler's boyhood, the gulf between Jews and French Canadians appeared unbridgeable. More than a few French Canadians, he observes, believed St. Urbain Street Jews were secretly rich and manipulated the black market.

In a cruel rejoinder, he adds, "My typical French Canadian was a moronic gum-chewer."

World War II was a time of grief for Jews who had left family and friends in Poland. It was also a time, Richler writes, when Canada left the Depression behind and "our fathers earned a good living."

By the same token, he remembers with bitterness, Jews faced rejection and unacceptable barriers.

"I can recall seeing swastikas and 'A bas les Juifs' painted on the Laurentian highways. There were suburbs and hotels... and country clubs where we were not wanted, beaches with signs that read GENTILES ONLY, quotas at universities..."

And then the kicker: "The democracy we were being invited to defend was flawed and hostile to us."

Toward the close of The Street, Richler harks back to Nov. 29, 1947, when the United Nations approved the Palestine partition plan.

"... we gathered at Habonim and marched downtown in a group, waving Israeli flags, flaunting our songs in WASP neighbourhoods [and] stopping to blow horns... " On this nationalistic note, The Street winds down.

Richler's stories, written with wit and pungency, evoke a period when Canada was a far different country – a nation whose tolerance of minorities was thin and in which Jews did not feel quite confident of their acceptance.

Krakowski's Destiny evident on new CD

By HELEN WINKLER
Special to The CJN

In Yiddish, Goyrl means destiny, and it was destiny that I, a lover of folkdancing and world music, should discover a treasure trove of Yiddish cultural history while surfing the Web.

It was destiny that led me to the cybershtetl known as the Jewish-Music Mailing List. It was also destiny that through this list I met Wolf Krakowski, a musician who grew up in Toronto and whose psyche is firmly rooted in Yiddish song, yet who is equally at home in the world of modern pop, blues and jazz.

The songs on Krakowski's new CD, Goyrl: Destiny, like those on his previous Transmigrations, are in Yiddish with translations provided in the liner notes. The CD begins with a smoky, sensual, rough-hewn tune called Tate-mame, a lament of a child, the black sheep of the family, whose behaviour shattered his parents' simple, happy lives.

This is followed by a languorous version of the Zeltlin/Secunda tune, Dona Dona.

Ever wonder what a combination of Nyabingi/Grounation drumming with overtones of Celtic/Appalachian "high lonesome" bottleneck blues guitar would sound like in Yiddish? Kh'vel Shoyn Mer Nisht Ganvenen (I'll Never Steal Again), a song of the Jewish underworld, is a captivating example of just such a song, which conjures up images of chain gangs and African boot dancing.

The CD continues with an eclectic mix of musical influences – everything from a country tune with steel drum accompaniment (Mit Farmakhte Oygn-With Eyes Closed) to a strident, powerful rendition of the Chanukah song Drey Dreydl (Spin Dreydl).

One is struck by the solitary counting song Hundert (One Hundred), attributed to to an anonymous inmate of the Mielec concentration camp. According to Wolf, it was sung for the amusement of the German camp guards, perhaps earning the singer an extra ration of sustenance.

A spare and haunting arrangement of the song Tife Griber, Royter Laym (Deep Pits, Red Clay) conveys a tragic, mournful mood.

In contrast, we are treated to a sexy, gutsy rendition of Zingarella. I've heard this song played insipidly many times, but Wolf's version quickly had me dancing the miserlou with a few extra bumps and grinds.

The high calibre musicianship of Wolf's musical projects is evident in Goyrl: Destiny. As in Transmigrations, Wolf is joined by acclaimed vocalist Fraidy Katz and the Lonesome Brothers, an ensemble specializing in American roots-rock. Ensemble members Jim Armenti and Ray Mason have played and performed this kind of music for more than 30 years.

A host of other wonderful instrumentalists and vocalists accompany Wolf's earthy, heartfelt singing. They include Charles Neville of the Neville Brothers on saxophone; Brian Mitchell (who played with Bob Dylan on the Grammy-winning Timeless: Hank Williams Tribute) on accordion and organ; Doug Beaumier, master of the pedal steel guitar; percussionist Daniel Lombardo; Corner Mentos, a former soccer player now on steel drum; and multi-instrumentalist/folk musicians Seth Austen and Beverly Woods. Frank London works his musical magic both on trumpet and as producer.

Joining Fraidy Katz on backup vocals are Jaye Simms and Pamela Smith Salavka, whose "extemporaneous singing" Wolf describes as "angelic."

The mix of songs in Goyrl: Destiny affected me strongly, alternately provoking laughter, tears and dancing. Some songs speak directly to the tragedy of the Jewish experience. Yet some also contain a message of optimism, as in the following lyric: "Hope./ you won't be denied/ and blooming roses/ be strewn on your way."

Goyrl: Destiny was released by Tzadik Records and is distributed by Koch International.

Helen Winkler lives in Calgary, where She teaches Israeli and international folkdancing. She also maintains a Web site dedicated to the revitalization of eastern European Jewish dances (www.angelfire.com/ns/helenwinkler).

A woman's journey between death and burial

By JUDY BART KANCIGOR
Special to The CJN

It's the ultimate fantasy: You have a seat at your own funeral.

Now imagine that while hovering in limbo between your death and burial, you have the power not only to witness the preparations and critique the eulogies, but also to eavesdrop on critical moments in your past for a reality check.

Such is the premise of Merrill Joan Gerber's latest book, Anna in the Afterlife, (Syracuse University Press/Library of Modern Jewish Literature,) which chronicles Anna's four-day journey between her grueling death at 90 and her burial.

When last we left Anna in Anna in Chains, she was lying helpless in a nursing home, paralyzed in one arm, feeding tube gurgling, and begging for death. Not exactly the stuff of comedy.

Yet in Anna in the Afterlife, after seven agonizing years chained to her bed, Anna finally nears that "famous tunnel she'd heard about on Oprah," and what would have turned maudlin from a lesser writer is at once poignant, riveting, even amusing in Gerber's capable hands.

Finally for Anna, "the great and famous moment" arrives, and she relinquishes "the spark every tiny ant and worm wants to keep hold of, the force that makes flies evade the swatter and convulses fish off their baited hooks."

Brittany Kay, 11, just can't wait to be a kid

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

Brittany Kay, playing Young Nala in Disney's The Lion King at Princess of Wales Theatre until November, says her biggest dream is to remain an ordinary kid.

"I don't mean I want to stop acting, but I do want to walk to school and be with my friends. In the long run, that is what counts."

Britanny, 11, who just completed Grade 6 at Ventura Park Public School in Thornhill, had to give up overnight camp and miss several bat mitzvah parties to take on the role, but says she does not "regret it for the world."

It was a huge decision, says her mother Marla, but she was prepared to make the commitment. "We have all had to live, eat and breathe theatre, but it's something we would not miss."

Brittany began acting at CharActors Theatre Troupe two years ago, but she has always sung and danced at home. "It's in her blood," says Marla.

When talent agent Shari Quallenberg saw Brittany in some of the troupe's plays, she encouraged her to sign with her agency, Talent Vision, and the work began, says Marla. "It was hectic rushing downtown for auditions, but Brittany really wanted it and Shari believed in her."

She tried out for several parts that she did not get, but she never felt rejected, says Marla.

"She was happy to have been given the chance. When we went to the fifth audition, for the part of little Rose in Haven, a CBS, four-hour mini-series about the Holocaust, Brittany said it was the last one. She had had fun, but it was enough.

"The good news was she got that role. The bad news was that she had to die on the first night of the mini-series. That made us both very sad."

Brittany then went on to play the part of Svetlana, a co-host in CBC's teen talk show Jonovision. "I had to talk with a European accent. It was great; kids began recognizing me and asking me for my picture," Brittany says.

As Young Nala in The Lion King, Brittany is on stage four times a week, but because she also understudies the role, she is at the theatre for eight performances.

"I rehearsed for three weeks and we were taught how to pronounce all the words in the songs. I read over my lines and everything just clicked in.

"I was excited to get on stage, but I was never nervous. I was told to tell the story to the audience, and that is what I did," says Brittany.

Brittany Kay, 11, wants to be an ordinary kid.

When she is onstage, she says, she gets lost in the story.

"It's about the circle of life; everything lives, everything dies. One day our bodies become grass, and the antelope eats the grass. There are so many morals in the play and each one is connected to the circle of life.

"I know every line in the play, and I feel like I could take over any part. We're not supposed to sing backstage, but we can't help ourselves," she says.

At school, says Brittany, her best friends are excited for her, "but there are people who are jealous and who make fun of me. I just ignore them."

She does her homework when she is waiting backstage, and she is able to make quick phone calls to her friends. "They keep me up with my homework, even though I only miss half a day a week of school."

She is adamant about going on to university. "If an acting career comes along, that's great, but I'm not gearing myself for it. If someone discovers me that's good, but if not, that's okay too. Wherever this takes me, it will take me."

She'll never forget this experience, however. "There are only four kids in the cast and everyone else looks out for us. We are all like family; it's as if they adopted us.

"There are kids who were in the play three years ago, and they have come to visit us. They never forgot the closeness; it is an everlasting bond," says Brittany.

In death, she is free to revisit her past, and memorable characters materialize: her mother's bigamist first husband, her jealous 86-year-old sister Gert attempting suicide in a red peignoir, her half-brother Sam who she learns had molested her and her sister. ("I thought it was his thumb," claims an unperturbed Gert.)

Loosened in death from the shackles of physical suffering, she is free to unlock her family's many secrets and long forgotten mysteries: Did her brother really drown while fishing on erev Yom Kippur? ("Who needed fish that fresh?") Did Anna really win her husband by parading in front of her sister's date in a negligee?

For the first time Anna confronts her own racial prejudice, her sexual reluctance, her stinginess.

"'Nothing but the best' was not a phrase Anna had thought her children should live by. Now she was feeling the consequences of her philosophy. She would have third rate corned beef at her funeral reception, seedless Christian rye bread, and prune Danish made with lard, with not a single salty black olive or a plate of pickled herring in sour cream on the table."

Gerber knows only too well the degradation and suffering of the elderly, kept alive beyond their time in "a holding pen for dying animals." She had watched helplessly as her own mother begged for death.

"But Anna is not my mother at all," says the prize-winning author. "She didn't have that irony, that speed of retort. She is a combination of what I knew about her life, what I imagined a certain voice in her head would sound like – which is a combination of me and her – and my invention."

A fiction writing instructor at California Institute of Technology, Gerber is a careful observer of those thousands of details that forge family dynamics, and skillfully transforms life's ordinary and gut-wrenching moments into compelling prose.

Even Gerber's nonfiction journal Old Mother, Little Cat, brilliantly counterpoises her nursing home visits to her real life mother with her nurturing of a lost kitten.

In the end Gerber tells us: "Anna accepted her fate." But has Gerber accepted it?

"I haven't made peace with the way we are forced to suffer at the end of our lives," she says.

"I'm hoping the world will rearrange itself from those fanatics who say that life at any cost is worth preserving."

Is Anna really "ended"? "Do any Jews even believe in an afterlife," muses Gerber.

"I didn't hear it from my relatives. They had no confidence that there was any kind of heavenly reward ahead."

With Anna gone, Gerber wastes no time with idle retrospection. Look in November for Botticelli Blue Skies, the saga of her sojourn in Italy, and a book of essays, Gut Feelings: A Writer's Truths and Minute Inventions, due in spring 2003.

BIRDS IN JERUSALEM & JAZZ IN EILAT

The following tourism briefs come courtesy of the Israel Government Tourist Office in Toronto.

Animal Life of Jerusalem: Nocturnal tours offered by the Jerusalem Bird Observatory (JBO) introduce participants to the bats, owls, turtles, frogs and even deer that live within the city. Located between the Knesset and the Supreme Court, the observatory pioneered nighttime safaris. These pre-arranged guided group tours begin at about 7:30 p.m. and can last until midnight. The stated objective is to demonstrate that nature exists in the city.

"Visitors don't believe that you can come to the centre of Jerusalem and see the animals. They think we are joking," says the observatory's Avid Gal. "After the tour is over, they don't want to leave."

The JBO, which occupies a one-acre plot of land, has educated thousands of Israeli schoolchildren about the dozens of bird species that fly the local skies. Recent sightings include buzzards, cuckoos, woodpeckers and nightingales. Web site: www.birds.org.il/bulbul.

Red Sea Jazz: Eilat, with its endless beaches, water sports and multiple attractions, is one of Israel's top three tourist sites. Next month, music lovers will have an extra reason to visit the Red Sea port city.

Beginning Aug. 16, the 16th annual Red Sea Jazz Festival offers four days of music in honour of jazz legend John Coltrane, who would have been 75 this year. The Riviera Hotel will host nightly poolside jam sessions. The fare also includes Gypsy and Balkan music played by a 15-piece Yugoslavian band. Master classes in jazz are being offered at the King Solomon Hotel on Aug. 28 and 29.

Rothschild Wine Country: A new master plan has been prepared to bring Zichron Yaakov, the historic town nestled between Tel Aviv and Haifa, out of hiding. The plan involves preserving Zichron Yaakov's first water tower and other distinctive buildings, making upgrades to the famous Wine Park, and adding hotel rooms and other long-term accommodations.

Founded in 1882 by Romanian immigrants, Zichron Yaakov was named after the father of its generous patron, Baron Edmond de Rothschild. The town is still very much a farming community, with many of its residents personifying the agricultural mentality of Israel's early days. Tours are available of the local Carmel Mizrachi winery and other wineries.

Little Italy in Jerusalem: The U. Nahon Museum of Italian Jewish Art in Jerusalem has scheduled a myriad of summer events to provide a taste of Italy in the heart of the Holy Land. Highlights include a five-day Art of Pasta festival starting Aug. 4, and walking tours focusing on Jerusalem's Italian attractions throughout August.

Founded in 1981, the museum is home to an impressive collection of Italian Jewish art dating to the end of the 15th century. It also holds the interior of an abandoned 300-year-old synagogue that was dismantled and shipped to Israel in the late 1940s. Web site: www.jija.org.

Beauty Treatment: Jaffa, the picturesque Mediterranean port city to the south of Tel Aviv, is about to receive the equivalent of $47 million (Cdn) in improvements. The place from which the biblical Jonah departed before being eaten by a whale, Jaffa is famous for its restaurants, artists' quarter, quaint alleyways and historic clock tower. The city was Eretz Yisrael's traditional port of call, welcoming Jewish and Christian pilgrims for centuries.

New Observation Tower: Jerusalem officials have approved construction of a 135-metre observation tower, perched on a ridge on the city's southern outskirts. The project, which includes a restaurant and telecommunications platform, is slated for the neighbourhood of Armon Hanatziv, situated on the boundary between urban Jerusalem and the surrounding desert.

According to plan, the tower will hold 600 people on six floors and offer a 30-kilometre view in any direction. It is expected to offer a breathtaking display of Bethlehem and Hebron to the south, and the Edom and Moab mountain ranges to the east.

Joint Study Tour: Two Toronto synagogues, the Beth Tzedec and the Holy Blossom, sent some 20 congregants on a study mission to Jerusalem this month. The trip was conducted in conjunction with Jerusalem's Shalom Hartman Institute, which promotes understanding among all segments of Israeli society.

The mission marked the first time the two synagogues co-operated on such an endeavour. Rabbi Baruch Frydman-Kohl, the Beth Tzedec's spiritual leader, said he hoped it would be a model for future journeys that "also reach into the Orthodox community."

Campaign publicizes male breast cancer

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

Breast Cancer: Men get it too.

That's the message of a new educational campaign by the Marvelle Koffler Breast Centre at Mount Sinai Hospital that hopes to raise awareness among physicians, patients and the general population about breast cancer in men.

The centre has developed a new brochure and a new Web site (www.mtsinai.on.ca/mkbc/mkbcresources/malebc.htm) to inform the public that men also have breast tissue and, like women, can develop breast cancer.

Although it is less common in men than in women, male breast cancer accounts for one in 100 cases of the disease. It usually affects men 60 years of age or older.

Margaret Theall, who co-ordinated the project, says the brochure was made possible through a community education grant from the Ontario chapter of the Canadian Breast Cancer Foundation.

"We are now looking at ways to distribute the brochure," Theall says.

The centre hopes to publish a version of the brochure in Chinese as well as other languages.

The information in the brochure, adapted from an article written by Dr. June Engle in a 1996 issue of Health News, published by the University of Toronto's faculty of medicine, includes information on the types of breast cancer found in men, as well as symptoms, diagnosis, treatment, and key risk factors.

Although older men are more often diagnosed with breast cancer, younger men can get it too, the brochure warns.

Breast cancer in men is often overlooked, Theall says, adding that delays in diagnosis lead to the disease being treated at an advanced stage of development.

Women will be a key target audience for the campaign, she says, since they are often responsible for health in the family.

For more information on male breast cancer or other information on breast examination and breast cancer, write to, The Marvelle Koffler Breast Centre, 12th floor, Mount Sinai Hospital, 600 University Ave., Toronto, M5G 1X5, or call 416-586-8799.

Israel & the Jewish World

IMMIGRANTS ARRIVE: An El Al flight with 329 immigrants from North America, the single largest such group in 25 years, arrived in Israel earlier this month. They were sponsored by U.S.-based Nefesh B'Nefesh, which aims to remove financial and logistical obstacles to aliyah from Canada and the United States. Pictured at right is Rabbi Yechiel Eckstein, founder and president of the International Fellowship of Christians and Jews, which was one of several other groups involved in the project. Bronze beverage tastes especially sweet from Lord Stanley's mug

By ADAM GRACHNIK
CJN Intern

How many people can say they drank from the Stanley Cup?

I can.

Last Thursday night, as two of my friends and I were driving down to The Madison, a bar just down the street from the Bloor JCC, a stretched Expedition SUV pulled up beside us with a back window rolled down. My friend Warren immediately screamed, "Oh my god, that's the Stanley Cup."

Inside the SUV, Kris Draper of the Detroit Red Wings – a Toronto boy – and his entire family were celebrating Draper's recent Stanley Cup win.

Draper's wife took a liking to my friend and we were invited to join them inside the bar.

It was a mob scene, but after dodging security and smooth-talking the right people, we were on the patio and – once again – in the presence of hockey's greatest prize.

As our mouths opened, tongues waggled and eyes widened in anticipation, the Cup was tilted and the booze began to flow. My lips sealed around the vessel and images and pictures ran through my head a mile a minute – Gretzky had done just this.

I took one last peek at the Cup and the wasted beer on the floor and the experience was over. For exactly two minutes, I felt like hockey's greatest superstar, drinking from a mug that millions all around the world train, sweat, fight, work, live and yearn to do.

It was euphoric, but oddly uncomfortable – I didn't earn this.

But honestly, it was the best tasting beer I've ever tasted.

Jewish female quarterback adds glamour to pro team

By MARVIN GLASSMAN
Special to the CJN

MIAMI — Anita Marks is a talented young athlete trying to make a name for herself in a sport that does not seem particularly feminine, sort of like Billie Jean King once did in the world of tennis.

Marks is winning supporters for the up-and-coming sport of women's professional football. Like the NFL and CFL, the Independent Women's Football League features many of the same brutal features – players colliding with each other, gang tackling, trash talking and players so overweight they look like professional wrestlers.

But the 32-year-old Jewish quarterback has taken matters into her own hands by catering to age-old male chauvinism. Marks, an attractive five-foot-six woman, decided to pose nude for the September issue of Playboy magazine as a way of generating more attention for her sport as well as herself.

"I am the first one to say that it is too bad that women have to cater to men's interests to sell the game, but it is the truth. Look at how sex sells.

"The careers of Anna Kournikova [a women's tennis star] and many other women athletes just skyrocketed when they were in Playboy," said Marks.

Marks is savvy and does not fit the stereotype of the coddled athlete. When not playing football, she works as a sports radio host in Miami and aspires to be a commentator on NFL football telecasts.

Her idea may not be far fetched.

"Anita's understanding of football is better than most men's. She understands all the sophisticated run and pass plays, the Xs and Os that have made a difference to our team," said Lisa McAllister, owner of Marks' team, the Miami Fury.

Marks has led her team to an undefeated 6-0 season thanks to her leadership and spectacular arm strength. In a recent 28-0 thrashing of the Atlanta Extreme, Marks was impressive – throwing touchdown passes of 58 yards and 35 yards and scrambling to avoid sacks, in the tradition of former NFL quarterback Fran Tarkenton.

She is also tough as nails in rebounding from injury. In 2000, Marks suffered a major knee injury that sidelined her for the season. Last year, she had reconstruction surgery on both knees. Considering that her pay, at $500 (US) a game, is way below CFL and NFL standards, another athlete might have retired under the same circumstances.

"I love what I do. If I can be an asset to my team, I will play. I am not a quitter," she said.

Marks has been rewarded with endorsements for many products, including one that also has Miami's other Jewish football quarterback, Jay Fiedler of the NFL Miami Dolphins, as a spokesperson.

"In a fantasy, many people in the community would like to see the two Jewish quarterbacks get together and marry. The truth is that I have been in and out of relationships. Many men can't accept the fact that my career comes first. Marriage will have to wait," she said.

Born and raised in Miami, Anita's parents, Ned and Minnie Marks, were divorced when she was young.

"She took after her father, even though she lived with me. Ned was a star football player with the University of Miami Hurricanes in the late 1960s," her mother said.

Marks, who bears a strong resemblance to her father, who died of a heart attack in 1997, played high school football and played quarterback for the women's intramural flag football team at the University of South Florida in Tampa.

After graduating with a degree in broadcasting, Marks worked as a sports producer on television stations throughout Florida, but she was eager to play football again.

"I love the game. This is not a tomboy thing. My mother was concerned in high school that I wouldn't have dates if I continued to play, so for a few years, I listened to her," Marks said.

"Now I am an adult and I feel the same way about the game now as I did years ago. People will accept me the way I am. If they don't, that is not my problem."

David Rosenzweig

Somewhere after midnight on Saturday, July 13, Chavie Rosenzweig lovingly and quite ordinarily filled a mug with coffee and sugar for her husband, David, of 24 years. The phone rang, and Ezra, their son, asked his dad to come and help him following a car accident.

Like his father, Moshe, had tenaciously done for him, David hurried to assist his beloved Ezzy, telling Chavie that he would return shortly to drink the java. The coffee cup is still filled with its contents and sits in the cupboard, beside the counter where it was prepared.

On that evening, a lovely night twinkling with stars, David waited patiently with Ezzy for a tow truck in front of a local pizza place. Friends passed by and said, gutta voch – have a good week, as Jews do. Moments later, David was dead.

Since that moment, one that changed reality with the aggression and suddenness of a dictator, the magic and legacy of David's life has begun to reveal itself in a way that was hidden while he lived.

In the Sunnybrook Emergency Ward, Leah, our sister, terrified yet always stoic, held Chavie, her elder sibling and friend, fiercely working to keep her freshly broken heart together. Chavie's sorrow, etched into her magnificent blue eyes, reflected the epilogue of their storybook love affair. Chavie was his Rachel and David was her Yaakov.

David and Chavie's daughter, Sheera, wept fresh orphan tears, which flowed from a seldom-visited place in the soul, a crevice reserved for the mourning of a child. As she cried, however, Sheera softly and protectively caressed her father's covered body with her graceful hands – the same tender hands with which she held David's three-month-old grandson.

Two long, short days later, their son Shalom ascended the bimah at Clanton Park Synagogue, closed his eyes before thousands of mourners and journeyed to a place of holiness, eulogizing his father the way the righteous do. Ezra, with the skill of a public orator, but the passion of a cherished son, did the same.

David Rosenzweig's lifetime epic was unfolding.

We began to learn about a star whose business ability and integrity verged on genius and fell from his tree into the garden his son, Mayer, was planting.

We quietly admired the mountainous love and concern that the brothers, Arthur, David and Shlome expressed for their parents. On the day that David died, big brother Arthur (Rosie), flew to Miami to ensure that their mother, Fay, would have his arms to fall into, when her knees weakened like our matriarch Sarah's did upon hearing of Isaac being sacrificed.

The legacy that David leaves to us who mourn his physical disappearance from our earth is this. A man's actions encourage other actions. If those actions are beautiful ones, beauty will blossom from them. If those actions are evil, further evil is perpetuated.

He was only 49 years old, and tragically left behind a woman he loved with all his might, six children, a mother, two brothers, a grandson, other family members, colleagues, friends, the Jewish people and a world that needs his gentleness.

But more importantly, David, a man who rarely stopped smiling, taught us that deeds, which emanate from the heart of one man, affect the entire world. In David's case, those deeds were courageous, caring, loving, decent, and he made our world shine like a gem.

This Shabbat, when you make a l'chaim like David did, reach out for the stranger in your midst, like David did, and smile at him/her. Invite him/her home with fierce sincerity, like David did. Join with your guests in a glorious moment over herring and song, just like our beautiful David did.

Run to your child when he/she needs you and hold your wife with the romance of your first year in love. Teach your children to love wisdom like David did with little Shragi and Yechiel. Kiss your brothers, and tend to your mother and father. Ask the sick how they are, even when you're suffering. Love being a Jew, and act with respect and decency, just like David did.

Shalom for now, David. I always thought you were a regular good guy. But now, I know that was your greatness. We will harvest your goodness. God bless the living.

About Life

Dear Ella,

I have a sister whom I love dearly. But although her heart is in the right place, she thinks the world revolves around her needs.

When she has an appointment, she usually calls me to watch the kids… I'm there. When she needs computer help, she calls me… I'm there. When she has to leave town on a business trip she calls me… I'm there.

I'm sure you get the picture. I rarely call upon her for help with anything. I usually hire help so I don't have to bother anyone.

Don't get me wrong, I really don't mind helping her out when I can. But when I'm busy with my own life, she gets offended and puts pressure on me. It's not that hard to guilt me into doing something, but this is where the resentment comes in and I don't want it to come to that. Any suggestions?

Pressured

Dear Pressured,

It's nice to know that there is a strong bond between you and your sister and that you can count on each other in a pinch. However, she has taken it too far. She is putting you in a position that you shouldn't have to be in. She is what I call a "taker" whereas you are a "giver." These types of relationships are usually doomed as the "giver" is usually beaten down to the point of resentment or sometimes even hatred. In a marriage, this kind of relationship rarely works, but in a sibling relationship, you can never really end it. You are bonded by blood.

I'm not sure your sister understands the pressure she is putting on you as she sees life from her point of view only. This is her personality type. It's not that easy to change someone's personality, so you have to learn to say no and be at peace with it. Easier said than done! It takes practice and a very strong will to stand up to someone you love.

You need to feel comfortable knowing that you are doing your best and helping when you can. It's up to her now to accept you for who you are and not what you do for her.

Holocaust restitution agreement in jeopardy

By TOBY AXELROD
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

LUXEMBOURG — The president of the Claims Conference says the organization could withdraw from agreements protecting German insurance companies from lawsuits if the firms don't speed up restitution payments to Holocaust survivors.

Agreements signed two years ago protect the firms from being sued by Holocaust survivors or their heirs.

The agreements were key to beginning payments from a $5-billion (US) German restitution fund.

Given a delay in payouts, however, the Claims Conference now is weighing its options, Israel Singer said last week at the group's annual board meeting here.

But Wolfgang Gibowski, spokesperson for the German government and industry foundation Remembrance, Responsibility and the Future, said the German insurance firms are not dragging their feet at all.

"Up to now, they do not have the claims," Gibowski said in a telephone interview.

He said Singer should be addressing his concerns to the International Commission of Holocaust Era Insurance Claims (ICHEIC), a group established four years ago by U.S

Israeli Consulate to close

By DAVID LAZARUS
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — The city's Jewish community is trying to come to grips with the prospect that after 53 years, the comforting presence of the Israeli Consulate General here and in eastern Canada is set to become a thing of the past by October.

Concern in Montreal

"It's very sad, but life must go on," Israeli Consul General Shlomo Avital said in a telephone interview. "The confirmation [that the consulate will close] came yesterday [July 23]."

After the news broke July 21 on the Jerusalem Post Web site that the consulate would be one of eight diplomatic missions worldwide closed by Israeli Foreign Minister Shimon Peres, Jewish community leaders mobilized behind the scenes in an effort to have him reconsider.

But despite Jewish community leaders' avowed determination to keep on trying, at writing, the decision had not been changed. Peres reportedly said the choice was between Toronto and Montreal, and Montreal was picked because of its smaller Jewish population.

"If we didn't feel there was hope, we wouldn't do it," said Sylvain Abitbol, first vice-president of FEDERATION CJA of the efforts to keep the consulate open.

The presence of the Israeli Consulate, Abitbol said, is so much part of the fabric of the Jewish community – from Jewish day schools' commitment to Israel to Israel-Quebec exchanges – that the impact of having no consulate would be dramatic.

The News in Brief

CANADA

Yad Vashem Seminars

TORONTO — Two Canadians will be among 28 participants in Yad Vashem's International School for Holocaust Studies first-ever three-week seminar for Jewish educators. Twenty-six of the participants are from North America. The Canadians are Jennifer Turack, co-director of the March of the Living with UJA Federation of Greater Toronto, and Joyce Rifkind, director of the March of the Living with UJA Federation's Board of Jewish Education.

ISRAEL

Intifadah Cost: $11B

JERUSALEM — The Israeli economy has lost some $11 billion (US) in the past two years of conflict with the Palestinians, the Finance Ministry's chief economist said last week. The loss amounts to about 10 per cent of Israel's gross domestic product. The Finance Ministry issued a dismal forecast for next year, predicting that unemployment could reach 11 per cent, or 300,000 people.

Torahs Donated

JERUSALEM — Six Torah scrolls from a synagogue that was desecrated in Wales arrived in Israel on a special Jewish Agency flight last week. The Swansea Jewish community donated four of the scrolls to the Israel Defence Forces and two to educational institutions. The initiative follows the July 10 desecration of the shul in Swansea, home to about 100 Jews.

University Re-opens

JERUSALEM — Israel has permitted Al-Quds University to reopen in eastern Jerusalem. Israeli Public Security Minister Uzi Landau lifted the closure after university president Sari Nusseibeh pledged not to use the offices for Palestinian Authority (PA) activities. Landau closed down the offices three weeks ago, saying he had evidence that Nusseibeh, the top PLO official in eastern Jerusalem, was using them to conduct PA business, a violation of the Oslo accords.

WORLD

Israel Rally Planned

ENGLEWOOD, N.J. — A New Jersey volunteer group, Rally for Israel, led by Rabbi Shmuel Goldin, is trying to assemble thousands of Jews and Christians in a rally for Israel in Jerusalem from Aug. 12 to 14. Cost for departure from Toronto or New York, plus three days accommodation, is $999 (US), but some local federations are offering subsidies. For details, go to www.rallyinisrael.org.

Alleged SS Guard

WASHINGTON — The U.S. Department of Justice has launched citizenship revocation proceedings against a St. Louis man who allegedly served as a Nazi guard at the Gross Rosen concentration camp and its subsidiary facility, Dyhernfurth, beginning in 1943. The department alleges that Adam Friedrich, 80, a native of Romania, volunteered for service in the SS and was assigned to the camps. Thousands of civilians were persecuted, starved and killed there during his two-year tour of duty.

Buchenwald Overhaul

BERLIN — Restoration work began last week on a memorial at the Buchenwald concentration camp. The memorial, which was created in 1958 and includes a group of 11 bronze figures, depicts prisoners' resistance to their Nazi guards. The restoration is slated to take two to three years and cost $990,000 (US).

Papon Ruling

PARIS — France illegally denied Nazi-era war criminal Maurice Papon his right to an appeal, the European Court of Human Rights says. In a ruling last week, it said France blocked Papon's right to a fair trial when it refused to allow an appeal of his 1998 conviction. As a result of the ruling, Papon, 91, may get a new trial. Papon, who has a history of heart problems, began serving a 10-year sentence in October 1999 after being found guilty of helping deport 1,500 Jews to Nazi death camps.

California Confronts Campus Anti-Semitism

LOS ANGELES — The governor of California has asked the heads of two major state university systems to take action against anti-Semitic incidents on their campuses.

Gray Davis proposed a seven-point action plan in a letter to president Richard Atkinson of the nine-campus University of California system and chancellor Charles Reed of the 23-campus California State University system.

Davis singled out incidents at or near the University of California at Berkeley, including an attack on two Orthodox men, vandalism at the Hillel house, an illegal sit-in by pro-Palestinian demonstrators and anti-Semitic graffiti.

In addition, pro-Palestinian groups at San Francisco State University disrupted a pro-Israel gathering with virulently anti-Semitic invective, posted blood libels and used their Web sites for Holocaust denial.

Davis' specific requests included:

- a thorough review of all anti-Semitic incidents on all campuses and actions taken in response;
- an assessment of planned steps to prevent future incidents;
- a review of campus policies on demonstrations to ensure that free speech does not escalate into violence;
- orientation sessions for new students that include warnings that hate crimes will be prosecuted;
- the promotion of such values as civility, tolerance and understanding within the academic community; and
- a review of course descriptions to ensure "that they are forums for intellectual inquiry and not vehicles for discrimination, intimidation and hate."

Complaint filed over OHRC chief's remarks

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

The chief commissioner of the Ontario Human Rights Commission (OHRC) is being urged to step down over comments he made comparing the public funding of faith-based schools to support for apartheid.

Keith Norton should retract his remarks and resign, say Toronto lawyer Joseph Adler and Charles McVety, president of Canada Christian College, a post-secondary school with 800 students.

Adler, a lawyer with two children in Jewish day schools, has filed a complaint with the OHRC asserting that Norton "has clearly overstepped his bounds and has offended several minority religious groups in one fell swoop.

"Instead of promoting an environment of religious tolerance and co-existence for which his office is responsible for so doing, he has contributed to the very thing that he wishes to avoid. His damaging comments have the potential to create, if they have not already created, serious divisions in Ontario's society."

McVety said he would be filing a complaint this week over Norton's "outrageous, hateful and completely unjustified" statement. He said he would also ask Ontario Premier Ernie Eves to launch an investigation.

The anger over Norton's statement goes back to a press conference last month announcing the release of the OHRC's annual report, when he voiced concerns that the Tory government's private school tax credits could lead to educational apartheid and risked "ghettoizing" society by faith and race.

"I am deeply worried that [the tax credit] could lead to a proliferation of small independent schools with no or little regulation to ensure that the curriculum that is taught will be consistent with public policy in Ontario, particularly as reflected in the human rights code," Norton said.

He was also quoted as questioning whether the province would ever know if independent schools were teaching hate or promoting racist conflicts, and he referred to a news report that linked the founder of a private school to the Al Qaeda terror network.

In a letter to the OHRC outlining his complaint, Adler said Norton had contravened the preamble of the Ontario Human Rights Code, which promises "equal rights and opportunities without discrimination." Adler added that "there is no empirical evidence that private schools inculcate hatred."

McVety said Norton's critiques of the tax credit violate the OHRC's policy of non discrimination based on religion.

Under current Ontario law, Roman Catholic schools receive full public funding. Until the first phase of the tax credit was introduced about one year ago, other religious schools received no government support.

McVety said Norton should step down permanently as chief commissioner, or at least until the complaints against him are investigated. (When an OHRC member is the subject of a complaint, it is turned over to an independent trustee of investigations.)

"I would like the statements retracted so they don't stand when the issue of tax credits are discussed in the future," McVety added.

Shortly after his news conference, Norton clarified his remarks in an appearance on the Roy Green Show, a Hamilton talk radio program.

"I'm not opposed to tax credits for parents who send their children to private schools, and certainly that's a matter of policy that's in the purview of the government and legislature of Ontario and not the OHRC," he said.

"The specific reference that I made was to the risk or the possibility... of the tax credit providing an incentive for a proliferation of independent schools, and the concern I had that at the moment [was that] there appeared a lack of appropriate regulatory framework."

In that context, Norton said he had referred to a school headed by "an individual who allegedly had connections with an international terrorist organization" and to another incident in which a Scarborough high school that was rented for a heritage language class was decorated with children's artwork that was anti-Israeli.

Impressive new reading

From time to time, I use this space to review articles, essays and books that catch my attention. It is an important priority at The CJN to highlight, wherever possible, new writing by Canadian authors. That priority is part of our overall objective of lending profile to impressive, new Jewish writing, wherever found, which, in our opinion, is also impressive, new reading.

Rabbi Reuven P. Bulka is the spiritual leader of Congregation Machzikei Hadas in Ottawa, venerated not only by his congregants but by the wider Canadian community in Ottawa and beyond.

Rabbi Bulka brings to his pulpit a unique combination of penetrating intellect, gentle compassion, unreserved empathy, boundless energy, a self-effacing sense of humour and unwavering commitment to the well-being of others.

And he loves to write.

Rabbi Bulka has written, edited or co-edited more than 30 books covering an eclectic range of subjects, all of which are aimed at improving the lives of his fellow human-beings.

His most recent book is Best-Kept Secrets of Judaism, published by Targum Press, Inc. It is a little gem of ethical and moral instruction, much in the style of the writings, typified by the 18th century scholar Moshe Chaim Luzatto, that have become so popular and available to a wider Jewish public in the last quarter century.

The work is a fascinating and creative adaptation of a book written by Elazar Ezkari (sometimes known as Azikri) called Sefer Chareidim. Ezkari, who lived and studied in Tzfat in the latter half of the 16th century, was a contemporary of Isaac Luria and Joseph Karo. The Encyclopedia Judaica notes that Sefer Chareidim "had a wide circulation and was printed in over 27 editions" – an enormous amount given the state of printing at the time and the limited ability of a publisher to widely distribute any books.

In introducing Sefer Chareidim to a modern audience, Rabbi Bulka responds in part to the oft-heard and malignly-intended, but uninformed, criticism that Judaism concerns itself more with ritual than with essence.

"Judaism... is very much 'being' oriented," Rabbi Bulka writes in his introduction. "If we are doing mitzvot, Torah commandments, without being 'in' what we are doing, without genuinely and profoundly integrating what we do into our being, we are missing the basic thrust of the Torah, which is to shape us as people (Midrash Rabbah, Vayikra 13:3). We can hardly be shaped if our deeds are disconnected from who we are and are nothing more than rote exercises bereft of meaning.

"The focus of this book," Rabbi Bulka adds, "is to lay out some of the secrets of Judaism – those elements whose existence are not widely known, but which manifest the heart and soul of Judaism."

Best-Kept Secrets of Judaism is an intriguing little book, a chest whose treasures beckon to be discovered.

Ariel: The Israel Review of Arts and Literature, has just released its spring volume, No. 113. Based in Jerusalem, it is one of Israel's most prestigious and informative journals.

Now in its 40th year, Ariel features articles by and about Israel and the Jewish world's most renowned and respected scholars, poets, novelists, architects, artists and archeologists. It consistently offers highly engaging and educational material. The most recent issue is an exciting example of this.

The lead article is an elegant prose and photo montage on the newly-renovated Baha'i Gardens in Haifa. The volume also contains an eye-opening essay on the Jews of Afghanistan by Reuben Kashani, an instructive look back by Eric Gould on the early pioneer days of the struggling Yishuv in the Galilee – both of which are accompanied by rare archival photographs – and a poignant, at times, even painful, reminiscence by A.B. Yehoshua entitled In Search of Lost Sephardi Time, translated by Gilad Morag. Yehoshua transports us on delicate wings into the Jerusalem of his youth to visit with his "mixed" Ashkenazi and Sephardi family.

Ariel is published in English, French, German, Russian, Spanish and Arabic and is now available on the Internet at www.mfa.gov.il.

There is hardly a better way than reading Ariel of staying abreast of literary and cultural developments in Israel, supporting Israel's artistic and cultural community while at the same time indulging oneself in fine reading pleasures.

OPENING THE DOORS: The Opening the Doors Conference – a UJA Federation Board of Jewish Education (BJE) and Tikun Chaim initiative – was held at Camp Ramah, north of Toronto July 14 to 16. The conference provided an opportunity for people with disabilities, their parents and senior professionals to inventory our community's services for people with disabilities, and to explore how we can share existing resources and identify and fill the missing gaps. The three-day conference was the brainchild of Camp Ramah's Mitchell Parker, BJE executive director Seymour Epstein and Tikun Chaim director Debbie Gladstone. Toronto shuls, groups unite to create organization

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

Several synagogues and groups have come together under the umbrella of a new organization created so that they can help each other, co-ordinate communal programs and work together on behalf of the Jewish community of Toronto.

United Chesed of Greater Toronto was the brainchild of Thornhill dentist Brian Price.

In October 2001, Price invited all the Toronto synagogues and four community organizations to a meeting to outline the mission for United Chesed: "to create a unified body which will serve the Jewish community with all its pooled resources for the benefit and maintenance of Jewish residents in Greater Toronto."

Designed to help co-ordinate programs

He says a major goal in establishing United Chesed (kindness), was "to set up and maintain an active network of communications between the synagogues, to create a climate of shalom bayit [peaceful co-operation] for the well-being and stability of the community and to be an example for other communities."

Representatives of the 26 synagogues and other groups have met regularly to discuss their programs and assist one another in achieving their goals. Activities reported on have included hospital visits, home visits, supplying medical equipment, networking with people to help them find jobs, raising emergency funds and providing a clearing house for volunteers.

Price emphasizes that the members of United Chesed are from various religious segments in the community.

"I believe that this is the first time in Canadian Jewish history where we all sit at the same table with one common goal – to help all Jews," he says.

"We are not duplicating services that are available. Rather, we are networking the whole conglomerate of charitable services found in each organization so that where one is lacking, another can contribute."

Each organization reports on its endeavours, outlines its needs and its resources and discusses what it is can contribute to other groups.

Topics discussed have included unemployment and tourism problems occurring in Israel, European countries that are boycotting Israeli products, the need for storage space for clothing collected for the poor, food banks for the needy in Toronto and the need for more Jewish foster homes.

At a recent meeting, Price proposed the creation of a Web site that would be available to all synagogues and organizations.

"This Web site would list the needs of each synagogue, including chesed activities, job listings, dating and other information."

For more information about the United Chesed of Toronto, call Price at 416-219-6676.

Family physician becomes first Ontario Conservative mohel

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Dr. Mark Greenberg, a family physician with a shared practice in northwestern Toronto, doesn't always tell his staff or his colleague when he's performed a brit milah. Often, however, his smile gives him away.

"Nothing gives me greater pleasure, spiritually, now," said Greenberg, who became a mohel last fall after being approached by Rabbi Roy Tanenbaum, president of the Rabbinical Assembly, Ontario region.

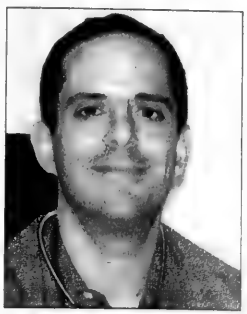
Greenberg, 41, had performed circumcisions in the early days of his career, but last year he studied more current techniques with Neil Pollock, a Vancouver mohel and physician. He also undertook more in-depth Jewish study, both here and with the head of the New York Board of Rabbis' milah committee. To become certified by the Conservative movement, he underwent a rigorous interview in New York.

Born in Toronto and raised in Ottawa in a traditional Jewish home, Greenberg – an alumnus of Camp Ramah and Ottawa's Hillel Academy whose family was active in Machzikei Hadas Congregation – was immediately receptive to Rabbi Tanenbaum's suggestion.

"It was always in the back of my mind. I liked the idea of doing something ritually, and it's a need. It's a happy thing," the father of three admitted during a noon-hour interview at his office on the 17th day of Tammuz, the day that begins the three-week mourning period leading up to Tisha b'Av. Instead of taking his usual lunch, Greenberg was fasting as traditional Jews do to commemorate the breaching of the walls of Jerusalem in 585 BCE and 70 CE that led to the destruction of the First and Second Temples.

As the first Conservative mohel in Ontario (but not in Canada), Greenberg fills not just the obvious need but one that has been troubling Conservative rabbis here for years.

"We, meaning the Conservative rabbis, had been looking for a long time to find a shomer Shabbos individual who would be able to serve as a mohel," said Rabbi Tanenbaum in a phone interview.



Dr. Mark Greenberg

Because the Conservative movement is a halachic movement, he explained, he and his colleagues recommend only "kosher" mohalim who are themselves Jewishly observant and perform ritually correct brit milahs.

Until now, that meant using only Orthodox mohalim. In most cases, that is not an issue, and Orthodox mohalim are still on the recommended list at local Conservative synagogues.

But in cases where the baby's mother has converted to Judaism under the auspices of the Conservative movement (and likewise the Reform movement), neither the child nor the mother is considered Jewish by Orthodox authorities.

Although some Orthodox mohalim will not officiate in such cases at all, others will perform a brit l'shem gerut – a circumcision for the purpose of conversion – instead of a standard brit milah, said Toronto mohel Aaron Jesin. The blessings are slightly different, and the brit is done in the presence of an Orthodox beit din, or rabbinical court.

The issue of brit milah for these babies is a delicate one. Greenberg said he preferred not to discuss it, referring The CJN to Rabbi Tanenbaum.

"I'm not a political type of person," said Greenberg. "I was asked to serve, and I'm happy to serve the community at large."

If he is asked to perform a brit on a baby whose mother has undergone a Reform conversion, he looks to the Rabbinical Assembly for guidance.

"We recognize Reform conversions, provided the Halachah is in accordance with what we do," said Rabbi Tanenbaum. "Here in Toronto, that's usually the case."

In cases where halachic elements like ritual immersion in a mikvah have not been included, the omission is remedied, Rabbi Tanenbaum said. Often, he noted, this is done before the baby is born, so that the child can have a "normal bris."

In other cases, if the family has not chosen to have a Reform mohel (of which there are eight in the greater Toronto area), a brit l'shem gerut is performed in the presence of a beit din, and mother and child go to the mikvah together at a later date, he clarified.

"In today's society," said Greenberg, "where [many] people don't know where they've come from or where they're going, we as the Jewish people can trace ourselves all the way back to Abraham because of the bris."

Norton said he used the term apartheid "to mean segregation or separation within the education system." He also said he was concerned that fringe racist groups might seek public funds for their schools, which would merely serve as fronts for racism.

In a subsequent letter to Ed Morgan, chair of the Ontario region of Canadian Jewish Congress, who appeared on the same radio talk show, Norton acknowledged that apartheid "is for some, a loaded term because of its use to describe the former abhorrent racist policies in South Africa. In retrospect, it would have been more sensitive to use a synonym such as segregated or separate. I regret any misunderstanding that was created."

Morgan said Norton's initial comments were "very inflammatory" and "not deserved," and he rejected Norton's suggestion that private schools foster intolerance.

But Morgan accepted Norton's clarifications and said he believes Norton "realizes he misused the phrase 'apartheid'" and later regretted it.

"The overall episode is a lesson that you should think before you speak," Morgan said.

Moral vacuity at the UN

The United Nations Security Council gathered last week to condemn Israel for the action it took in Gaza City against Saleh Shehadeh, the leader of the military arm of Hamas. The meeting was convened at the urgent request of the Arab members of the United Nations.

Israel rightly targeted Shehadeh. But along with him, it wrongly killed 15 innocent civilians, of whom 11 were children. Had they known there were civilians in the immediate vicinity, there would have been no attack, the IDF and senior government officials said. "The assessment of Shehadeh's building," Ha'aretz reported, "was that it was used only for operational purposes, that his family did not live there, but occasionally dropped in for short visits."

The president and prime minister of Israel and IDF officers expressed sorrow and regret at the horrible loss of civilian life. And an internal investigation by security officials was immediately initiated to try to pinpoint how and why the errors occurred.

That Israel expressed its remorse, conveyed its apologies and established the investigation is a testament to the vitality of its democratic institutions and to the predominance of conscience and civility in its active defense of the state and its people.

That Israel needed to seek out Shehadeh is a testament to the total absence of conscience and utter moral vacuity at the core of the Palestinian leadership. Shehadeh was personally responsible for the deaths and injuries of several hundred Israeli citizens. Over the past two years, the Palestinian Authority has ignored dozens of requests by Israel to rein in, if not bring in, Shehadeh.

But absence of conscience and moral vacuity are not only to be found among the Palestinian leadership. They are the hallmarks of the Security Council as well. Condemnation there of Israel is automatic, regardless of the issue, the circumstances or the truth. Yet, other pressing and ominous danger spots around the globe, many of them in the Middle East, warrant not even the occasional meeting of the council, let alone a critical or condemnatory word.

For example, Dennis Ross, the former U.S. Middle East envoy in the Clinton administration, sounded an urgent alarm last week in the pages of The Wall Street Journal concerning a "burgeoning danger that is receiving scant attention."

He was referring to the menacing destabilization of the region by Iran and Syria. "With a constant stream of supply from both the Iranians and Syrians," Ross wrote, "Hezbollah is building a formidable arsenal of highly mobile rockets [on the Israeli-Lebanese border]." In fact, more than 8,000 rockets, supplied by Iran through Syrian-controlled Lebanon, are currently aimed at Israel. Yet not a word of opprobrium has been directed at the Iranians or the Syrians by the Security Council.

Indeed, in one of the head-shaking ironies surrounding that world body, which evoke comparisons with Orwell's fictitious world of 1984, Syria holds one of the 15 seats on that council.

Bush plan a trap

The CJN's front page report (July 4) that Jewish groups back Bush and your editorial statement that U.S. President George W. Bush's speech is "a remarkably bold statement of foreign policy and inner conviction" have prompted this letter.

While Jewish leaders in the United States and Canada may applaud the formation of what I call a Bush-Sharon axis, my personal assessment of the final text is that it is largely an attempt to garner Jewish votes rather than a serious plan for peace in the Middle East. While democratization of Palestinian society is a noble objective, to make it a precondition for moving Israel-Palestinian relations from violence to the negotiating table is a non-starter. If Menachem Begin had insisted that Anwar Sadat democratize his country before engaging in serious negotiations, there would never have been an Israeli-Egyptian peace agreement. Jordan and Israel have signed a peace treaty; does anyone consider the current monarchy as a truly democratic state? When former Israeli prime minister Ehud Barak made overtures to the Syrians to trade land for peace, did he ever suggest that the discussion include a commitment to end the Assad family dictatorship?

I consider the president's suggestions a counter-productive detour rather than a road map for conflict resolution. I also feel it will encourage Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon to continue with his single-minded focus on military responses to the suicide bombings and on trying to impose his will on the Palestinian leadership and on the Palestinian people rather than on seriously non-violent alternatives.

Thomas Friedman of the New York Times has suggested that time is not on Israel's side. Israel, he has stated, has a short window of opportunity to make a deal with the Palestinians. If it does not act quickly, Arab population growth and Arabs' growing hatred for Jews, Americans and Israelis will soon make peace an unattainable objective. So beware of the Bush-Sharon axis. It is a trap, not an opportunity.

Hatred of Israel inbred early

It is extremely painful to watch the suffering of the Palestinian people, but at the same time, it is equally painful to realize how Palestinian hatred of Israelis blocks them from understanding who the real author of their misery is.

This hatred is promoted from childhood by their leaders. The recently published photograph of a Palestinian toddler dressed as a suicide bomber proved this.

The Palestinian people could have enjoyed a peaceful, Palestinian state with all the privileges of an independent, democratic country, before the problem of the "occupied territories" appeared. The generous offer by former Israeli prime minister Ehud Barak was more than Palestinain Authority President Yasser Arafat could have dreamed of, but instead of accepting or responding to it, he went to Malaysia to win the Muslim world over to his evil devices.

Israeli media experts and government offices realized (too late, in my opinion) that Israel is lagging far behind in what they see as a "Cold War-style" propaganda war being waged on some 140 Arab-owned, Arabic language satellite stations broadcasting through the Middle East. Perhaps Israel's Arab language satellite channel will enable Arabs to learn the real truth of the Palestinian-Israeli conflict.

Pakistan's double fault

The negative reactions by the Pakistan Sports Board and the president of the Pakistan Tennis Federation to one of its citizens playing tennis at Wimbledon with a Jew speaks volumes about intolerance and racial bias. Pakistan is all too willing to accept the presence of American soldiers in their fight against terrorism in Afghanistan, despite the fact some of those soldiers are Jews. Kuwait and Saudi Arabia were only too happy during the Gulf War to allow American Jewish soldiers to help rid their countries of Iraqi aggressors, but neither country will now allow a Jew to either work or visit there. These are some of the countries that are supposed to commit to normal relations with Israel once a Palestinian state is established. If a Jew and a Muslim are not permitted to shake hands on a tennis court, it really does not bode well for meaningful co-existence between Israel and Arab states. The Pakistani authorities are too blinded by hatred to even recognize that they have committed a double fault.

Assimilation should not be encouraged

The contrast between two articles in the June 27 issue couldn't have been more glaring. On the one hand, we were treated to an interesting D'var Torah by Rabbi Moshe Yeres based on the writings of Rabbi Naftali Tzvi Yehuda Berlin, popularly known as the Netziv. On the other hand, in the arts section, we encountered a story that inexplicably praised an intermarried couple. Surely, the Netziv would have protested.

In his essay Shaar Yisrael, the Netziv outlines the spiritual/historical forces that account for a rise in levels of anti-Semitism. Of course, the crucial one is assimilation, especially in the most pernicious of its manifestations, intermarriage. It seems that the featured intermarried couple, despite their good intentions, just might be more a part of present-day problems than part of the solution.

There are undoubtedly more creative solutions to the Mideast conflict than us disappearing as Jews. In this day and age of UJA Federation-sponsored "continuity" programs, certainly The CJN could at least refrain from putting a positive spin on events celebrating intermarriages, if they even have to be reported at all.

Jewish schools infuse teachers' lives with meaning

By ALEX POMSON

Jewish day school education is in the grip of unprecedented growth. In Toronto, 10 new Jewish day schools have opened their doors in the last six years. In the United States, the numbers of day school students doubled between 1980 and 2000. (The student population now stands at just over 200,000.) In England, for the first time in history, a majority of Jewish children now attend all-day Jewish schools. In eastern Europe too, a network of day schools has emerged from the ruins of the Shoah and Soviet rule.

Alex Pomson

Some argue that day schools will collapse under a personnel crisis of their own making, since expansion has occurred at a time when public school boards in most countries face a decline in the number of qualified individuals prepared to work in the classroom. Given that at the best of times it is hard to find enough quality teachers to staff day schools, there is reason to fear the worst when this difficulty is exacerbated both by rampant day school growth and by a teacher shortage in the public sector.

In my view, dire predictions of this sort are overstated. I am inspired by what I have learned in the last four years from three university-based research projects exploring the lives and work of Jewish teachers. (In one project, 20 graduates from York University's Jewish education program were interviewed; in the other two projects, 18 Jewish day school teachers were interviewed. All projects were conducted by the author and several graduate students in education.)

These studies make plain that day school work can provide teachers with special satisfactions. In the right circumstances, it can help teachers find a rare balance between work and parenting roles, and enable them to integrate different parts of their lives in ways that are compatible with their evolving identities as parents and workers.

While our research shows that there are teachers who see teaching as little more than a convenient form of employment, many we interviewed indicate that some of the deepest satisfactions in their work are related to their own search for personal meaning. Not only does teaching allow them to help others find a place in the world, it enables them to construct an identity as members of a special adult community. Schools are places where, as adults, teachers can find meaning in their lives.

I would argue that if the search for meaning is such a large part of teachers' lives, then Jewish schools might have more success recruiting and retaining teachers if they are organized as places that offer teachers multiple sources of meaning. Indeed, Jewish schools may be better placed to recruit and retain teachers than public boards. Our research shows that, in at least four different ways, day schools offer teachers an opportunity to connect dimensions of selfhood that may not be present in other settings.

Chevrah*/Fellowship:

One of the most pervasive features of day schools is that teachers do not work in isolation. All teachers share their students with at least one colleague. The dual curriculum of Jewish and general studies means that they must negotiate the dimensions of the classroom environment with a partner chosen for them in an arranged match.

The dual day school curriculum of Judaic and general studies is frequently viewed as a major source of stress, forcing teachers to shoehorn a day of work into a few short hours. Yet the bifurcated day may provide a benefit. Forced into cross-curricular partnerships by the structure of the program, teachers find themselves participating in relationships which, fortuitously, provide an opportunity to counter the isolation that plagues teachers in most schools. These relationships can have a strong effect on job satisfaction. It implies that schools might have greater success retaining teachers if they were to allow them to have some say in determining their cross-curricular partners.

A working life shaped by the rhythms of the Jewish year:

Rabbi David Hartman of the Hartman Institute in Jerusalem has argued that only in Israel can Jews feel anything other than socially marginal. There, one experiences how the Jewish liturgical calendar shapes the collective identity of the nation. Ironically, while teachers often struggle to communicate to their students that Judaism is more than a private pastime, participants in our studies indicate that work in a Jewish day school provides them with a visceral appreciation for the routines and rhythms of Jewish identity of the kind Hartman describes.

In mundane terms, the organization of the school year around the Jewish calendar offers a level of convenience not reproduced in many other workplaces. Day school teachers have enough time to return home for Shabbat, and need not ask for special permission to take days off for the chagim. More profoundly, the rhythms of the Jewish week and of the yearly cycle help teachers construct a sense of personal location that comes from belonging to a distinct community with its own routines.

The outstanding example of this is the festival of Pesach, which requires an extensive investment of curriculum time at school and personal time at home. One research participant reported how in her school, teachers and board members have never agreed on how many calendar days to take off before Pesach. Board members argue that if other respectable professionals don't have the liberty of taking time off to prepare for the festival, why should teachers? For teachers – the interviewee explained – the board members miss the point. Jewish schools are not (nor should they be) like other workplaces. It is when they reflect and relate to the contours of the Jewish year that they become desirable places to work.

Sharing a special language:

The Toronto Jewish day school system, where this research was conducted, is among a minority of communities in North America where the teaching of Ivrit b'Ivrit (Jewish studies in Hebrew) is the norm rather than the exception. This fact impinges on teachers' professional commitments and self-understanding in acute fashion.

Almost all the participants in our research indicate that the role of Hebrew in the curriculum has a profound impact on their deepest motivations. For many non-native Hebrew speakers, the opportunity to teach in Hebrew provides one of the most compelling reasons to teach in a Jewish day school.

Participants' assessment of their potential to make a difference in students' lives substantiates a claim made by Jonathan Sarna in a history of Jewish education in America. For Sarna, the Ivrit b'Ivrit movement "kidnapped" mainstream Jewish education in the United States during the 1930s. In so doing, it transformed the self-esteem of Jewish educators. "Ivrit b'Ivrit elevated lowly teachers, making them feel part of the most significant movement in Jewish life. Devoted Jewish teachers believed with all their heart and soul that the future of American Jewish life depended on them."

This is a precise summation of what drives Canadian-born teachers who can employ a body of special knowledge with skill and effect. Their mission to show students that Canadians can master Hebrew drives them to tolerate a range of discomforts that come from being a non-Israeli minority among their colleagues. Sarna's account also indicates why those who struggle with Hebrew feel discomfort in their work. If they do not have a critical measure of competence, they come to question their professional worth.

If educational policy-makers are to tackle the challenges of recruitment and retention with success, they must consider the extent to which Hebrew can motivate and deter teachers in their work.

Becoming a parent:

There are few human experiences that have greater effect on the way we function in the world than the experience of becoming a parent. Career researchers have long been alert to the conflicted relationship between commitments to family and work. In recent years, feminist scholars have, however, subverted the dividing of teachers' personal and professional commitments and have paid more attention to the profound but radically unpredictable impact of parenthood on teachers' practice.

Our research demonstrates how unpredictable and enriching this impact can be. Parenting is experienced differently, and these differences inform teachers' values in diverse ways. Nevertheless, as Patricia Sikes has shown in a study of Parents Who Teach, parent teachers draw upon a common cultural repertoire to talk about such things as "the way they see their own children reflected in their pupils, their increased patience and empathy, [and] the effect their professional training has upon them as parents."

Day school teachers draw on these same cultural reference points. Yet in one respect at least, the particular context of day school work seems to modify these generalized patterns. For some day school teachers, becoming a parent leads them to ask not only "Is this how I want my own children to be taught?" but "Is this where I want them taught?" They wonder: "If this is not where I want them taught, is it where I want to teach?"

Day schools are private institutions with a variety of ideological forms, each of which gives expression to a particular vision of Jewish identity. When teachers become parents (and as their children age), they are prompted, unlike peers in public schools, to assess the fit between their personal and professional identity. Becoming a parent may, therefore, have disruptive or affirmative consequences for career commitments by uncovering previously unacknowledged inconsistencies between the personal and professional.

Implications for schools:

Research into teachers' lives is often organized around the poles of calling and career, and of vocation and work. This is not altogether surprising. Teachers are driven over the course of their careers by a vocational urge. It is tempting, therefore, to view everything else as a matter of context with little effect on the teacher's sense of self.

Yet, as our findings confirm, context contributes great meaning to teachers' lives. Context provides the sources for satisfactions that can sustain teachers over the course of a career and of experiences that can challenge some of their deepest beliefs about themselves. As we have seen, the day school context offers an opportunity to connect many dimensions of selfhood. It can encourage teachers to develop special collegial relationships with cross-curricular partners. It provides an opportunity to engage in a professional life shaped by the rhythms and practices of the Jewish year. It promises membership in a community enriched by a shared culture and distinctive language. And, of course, it offers each day the possibility of fulfilling a mission of engaging young people in a Jewish future. Separately, and even more so, collectively, these experiences can make work in a Jewish school very different from work in other schools.

For those we interviewed, working in a Jewish school can be quite different from working anywhere else. Occasionally, this work becomes problematic, but, perhaps, if Jewish schools cultivate some of the positive aspects that distinguish them from other workplaces, this distinctiveness can become a source of strength, providing teachers with persuasive reasons to take up appointments.

Inevitably, given that schools exist first and foremost to meet the needs of children, little attention has been given to how they can help teachers find meaning in their lives. However, it is reasonable to expect that if Jewish schools organize themselves as places capable of offering teachers multiple sources of meaning, they will have more success recruiting and retaining teachers. In fact, in some respects, they may be better placed to recruit and retain teachers than public schools.

This piece is an abbreviated version of a paper delivered by Prof. Alex Pomson on the occasion of his installation as Koschitzky Family Chair in Jewish Teacher Education at York University.

Flying: a new experience

Of course, it is not the act of flying that is new, but the way one has to do it these days. I write this column because my last trip to the United States gave me much to think about.

Rabbi Gunther Plant in Toronto

Because security needs have become a major consideration, one has to be at the airport two hours before the scheduled departure when travelling to the States. On my last trip – perhaps because my destination was Washington, D.C. – I was subjected to procedures more rigorous and time-consuming than in the past. I was searched several times and had to take off my shoes and my kneepads (for painless walking), which always attract attention. In the past, the inspection took only seconds, but this time it seemed to take forever.

I should have been pleased with these procedures, because my security was clearly enhanced by them, but I felt they were overdone. Then again, is there ever such a thing as overdoing security? Am I not better off when the authorities do more for my security rather than less? At any rate, that's the way it's done today, and I have been advised that in order to avoid any problems with my kneepads in the future, I should ask for the use of a wheelchair. So far, I have avoided going that route because, I suppose, I've wanted to avoid embarrassment. People who know I play tennis and golf would certainly wonder whether I've had an accident and become disabled. But worrying about what others might think is, of course, less than intelligent, so the next time I travel, I may accept the offer of a wheelchair.

As soon as the plane took off for Washington, we were informed that the toilets would be locked 30 minutes before arrival. At first that struck me as odd, but then I realized that the reason, no doubt, was to prevent someone from destroying the plane while it flew over the American capital. Safety appears to be best served when all passengers are in full view of the stewards.

In the past, when I expected to play some tennis at my destination, I would take my racquet with me. Not any more, since the last time I tried to do so, security officials relieved me of the racquet, apparently viewing it as a potential weapon. In the heated discussion that followed, I was advised that my racquet would be safe and I'd better get on the plane. I was given no receipt, and I received the racquet upon landing, after a fairly lengthy search.

Altogether, flying has become a more regulated experience, which has led me to think again of travelling by train, though – as I write this – I am wondering whether I will really do it. Old habits are hard to break.

It's déjà vu all over again

It seems like yesterday that we were basking in the sunlight of peace between Israelis and Palestinians. Thousands of Israelis were shopping in east Jerusalem and the shuks of the West Bank. They were gambling away millions in Jericho. Palestinians were building new homes, sending their children to school and university, and anticipating a better life under their own flag.

Today that seems like a dream as each side tears at the other's guts. We, the Jewish community, see it as the failure of Palestinian Chairman Yasser Arafat to foresee the chaos his antics would bring, and the failure of his cronies to warn him of the consequences of failure – if indeed they saw it coming themselves.

Jean M. Gerber in Vancouver

Naturally Palestinians see it otherwise, although voices are now being raised in mild protest as the information about what Arafat was offered by Bill Clinton and Ehud Barak seeps into the Palestinian street. But the match has been set to the straw.

Here in Canada we lead a good life. Jews appear in all segments of society, occupying the middle road as well as the extreme left and right of the political spectrum. We have a healthy reputation as liberal thinkers whose votes generally favour social justice, racial equality, a strong commitment to maintaining a social safety net and a Canadian foreign policy that respects and honours democratic institutions and countries free from tyranny. We are generally proud of our accomplishments, supporting the downfall of apartheid and our role as peace-keepers in tense areas of the world.

Yet as the Middle East unravels, we find ourselves back in the bad old days of 1967 and 1973, where newspaper ads excoriate Israel for war crimes, correspondents praise Arafat as though he were a combination of Martin Luther King and Mahatma Ghandi, leaders of the United Church and the Anglican Church of Canada revile Israel as the cause of it all, and the Canadian Labour Congress denounces Israel (the only country in the Middle East with a free and feisty labour movement). Synagogues are torched. Jewish institutions and cemeteries are defaced. Jews are attacked on the streets.

How did we get here? We have tried to explain Israel's position to media, government and people in our everyday lives. We have pointed out the incredible horror of mothers and children, Holocaust survivors and grandparents, being blown to tiny pieces. We have seen the pictures of young men drenched in blood, shouting their victory over two murdered Israelis. We have seen a picture of baby dressed as a suicide bomber. We know another generation of children is being raised to hate Jews. And here in Canada, both the right and the left have taken aim at our synagogues, our cemeteries and our morality. More chillingly, because it has the approval of the government, Magen David Adom has had its charitable status revoked because such "activities… lend support to Israeli settlements beyond the 1967 border." Hamas, yes – an ambulance service, no?

Shame on the Canadian Labour Congress. Shame on heads of the churches who criticize Israel, ignoring the flight of Christians because of the rise of Muslim extremists. Words like genocide, war crimes, apartheid, flow effortlessly from the lips of people who should know better but deny the sights of their very eyes and find Arafat a noble patriot. Shame on the CBC for its euphemisms, calling murderers "militants," "gunmen," even "assailants." They have no trouble calling the IRA "terrorists." Only Jews cannot be the victims of terror?

Shame on those "concerned citizens" who signed a recent ad in the Vancouver Georgia Straight once again accusing Israel. They include Libby Davis, Svend Robinson, George Heyman (president of the B.C. Government and Service Employees Union), and even Rape Relief, a Vancouver counselling centre and shelter. They accuse Israel of creating "fertile soil for the growth of brutality and the perpetuation of atrocities" and of a "systematic violation of the Palestinian population's basic human right to live free of military coercion and violence."

No, my friends, it isn't Israel who has denied this suffering population those things. It is the Palestinian leadership headed by Arafat. His delusional twists, today accepting what Clinton offered him two years ago, tomorrow exhorting his followers to kill, become more obvious. May he be like Macbeth, as the liberating armies drew near: "Now does he feel his title/ hang loose about him, like a giant's robe/ upon a dwarfish thief."

We will once again, as before, defend Israel. Isn't it time these well-meaning Canadian spokespersons listened?

Random summer thoughts

Shira, my wife, and I have decided to see James Brown in concert the day after Yom Kippur at the local baseball stadium. I'm a big fan of the Godfather of Soul and, given that he's in the twilight of his career, it's a safe bet that this will be the last time he shimmies across a Winnipeg stage.

Stuart Slayen in Winnipeg

After learning that the "hardest working man in show business" was coming to town, I decided to re-acquaint myself with some of his music. Among his most popular hits is a vowel-and-bass-heavy romp called "It's Too Funky In Here." Upon being reminded of that song, I couldn't help but think that if it had been written by a Jewish performer, it would have been called "Is It Too Funky In Here Or Is It Just Me?"

A few years ago, after reading a short list of English words that sound like they're Yiddish in The Big Book of Jewish Humor (including far-fetched, garnish, svelte and box-kite), a friend and I decided to expand the list as much as possible. For nearly a decade, we've been adding words here and there. It got to the point where we were dividing the list by categories. Occupations that sound Yiddish: beer vendor, fox breeder, minor leaguer and oyster shucker. Hockey goaltenders whose names sound Yiddish (a much shorter list): Ken Dryden. I went looking for our 300-item list a couple of weeks ago, only to discover I have no clue where I put it. According to The Big Book of Jewish Humor, if I tell my friend I lost it, he'll have a "conniption."

At bedtime, I try to always sing Hebrew songs to my three-year-old and one-year-old. Usually, if I'm in good voice, the songs not only expose them to some Jewish culture and Yiddishkeit, but they also relax them. My son likes Al Kol Eileh, Eli Eli (as sung by my wife) and Rad Hayom (a good-night ditty from my Camp Massad [Manitoba] days). My daughter used to like Erev Shel Shoshanim and currently favours a melodic version of Shma Yisrael. The other night, thinking my one-year-old son was drifting while I rocked him and sang, my eyes closed. It was a peaceful, spiritual, Jewish moment, until my son stirred and quickly stuck his finger up my right nostril as far and as fast as he could and then burst into laughter. After the initial shock, I realized that few things are as wonderfully spiritual as a child's laughter. And few things are as painful as trying to sing a Naomi Shemer song with a toddler's fist up your schnozz.

I'm going to camp this summer! Camp Massad is celebrating its 50th anniversary this year. We had a big, gala dinner in March, launched an endowment fund and later this summer, there will be an onsite weekend reunion for alumni. True campers know how powerful the connection with your summer camp can be. It's lifelong, it's colourful and it's emotional. And according to the Foundation for Jewish Camping, there is a growing body of evidence that positive Jewish summer camp experiences lead to a greater sense of Jewish identity and a greater participation in Jewish com munity life. See http://www.jewishcamping.org/ for more insights into the power of camping. As for our reunion, I plan to stay up late, sing songs and walk around tired the next day – kind of like parenting.

Earlier tonight, in a fit of procrastination and nostalgia, I picked up a copy of my yearbook from 1979 when I was in Grade 7 at Winnipeg's only Jewish junior/senior high school, Joseph Wolinsky Collegiate. The dedication reads as follows: "March 26, 1979 marked the date of the final signing of the Peace Treaty between Israel and Egypt. The treaty represented an end to 31 years of war and bloodshed in the Middle East. This yearbook is dedicated to those who fought so bravely for this day and to the memory of those who did not live to see it."

Twenty-three years later, that dedication sounds somewhat hollow.

The life and times of the Annenbergs

Walter Annenberg loomed large in American publishing, broadcasting and philanthropy.

As president of Triangle Publications, his properties included The Philadelphia Inquirer, the Daily Racing Form, TV Guide, Seventeen and a medley of television stations.

As a philanthropist, Annenberg gave away more than $2 billion (US), plus $1 billion worth of art, by the time he turned 90 in 1998, qualifying him as the United States' most generous philanthropist.

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

The friend of two American presidents, Richard Nixon and Ronald Reagan, this shy, retiring businessman sold his media empire to Rupert Murdoch for $3 billion in 1988 to devote himself, body and soul, to philanthropy.

Although he has been a respected figure in American society for several decades now, Annenberg was not always viewed in such positive hues.

Before he took over the business his father, Moses, had built from scratch, he was widely perceived as a spoiled playboy who would squander his inheritance. He not only proved his detractors wrong, but caused them to believe he was a gifted entrepreneur.

Annenberg had another burden to surmount. In the late 1930s, Moses was charged with income tax evasion and imprisoned after being hit with one of the highest civil fines in U.S. history.

When his father died shortly after his release in 1942, the family was left with staggering debts and a stained reputation. To his credit, he restored the Annenberg fortune and rubbed away the blemish.

Their saga, the stuff of a great American drama, is the subject of Christopher Ogden's Legacy: A Biography of Moses and Walter Annenberg (Little, Brown), a fine, balanced account of a prominent Jewish family.

Born in East Prussia, Moses arrived penniless in Chicago in 1885, and worked at a succession of menial jobs before striking out on his own as a newspaper distribution agent. By 1916, when he was living in Milwaukee, Moses was the proprietor of 30 nationwide agencies, Milwaukee's largest parking garage, two theatres, bowling alleys, billiard parlours, stores and apartments.

Moses' life changed irretrievably when Arthur Brisbane, chief editor and columnist of the Hearst newspaper chain, asked him to run the circulation department of a newspaper Brisbane intended to buy in Milwaukee. When Moses demurred, Brisbane offered him the publisher's job.

Several years later, the legendary publisher William Randolph Hearst appointed Moses as his national circulation manager. Brash and brilliant, Moses was not above battling rival newspapers with baseball bats and guns, Ogden suggests.

In 1922, Moses, never one to shirk an opportunity, bought the Daily Racing Form, the bible of the racetrack, and the General News Bureau, which supplied racing data electronically to legitimate news outlets and illegal bookmakers. It made him a millionaire, but his links to the underworld, however tenuous, tainted his name.

Moses left his position at Hearst in 1926, three years after establishing a holding company for his varied enterprises: racing publications, movie magazines, real estate, newspaper distribution agencies and a stock brokerage house. He provided well for his wife, Sadie, and their brood of children. When the Depression struck in 1929, Moses' net worth was $8 million.

By Ogden's estimation, Moses was a contradictory character. He denounced crime and corruption, but used ruthless, unethical methods against a competitor. He uttered idealistic pronouncements about journalism, but suborned journalistic ideals for personal expediency. He tried to lead a respectable family life, but kept a mistress and consorted with shady characters.

What is also certain is that he loved his only son, Walter, whose stutter had a profound impact on his psyche and behaviour. Moses was disappointed that Walter dropped out of university to play the stock market, where he fared badly. But in 1934, Moses invited him into the business as manager of the Miami Tribune, a daily he had recently purchased. Moses also encouraged him to write, and he penned an occasional gossip column.

In the mid-1930s, Moses bought The Philadelphia Inquirer, a staunchly Republican daily whose political philosophy matched his own views. Under his direction, the newspaper continued to attack President Franklin Roosevelt's New Deal social welfare programs. Ogden suggests that Moses' anti-Roosevelt vehemence prompted the U.S. government to lay income tax evasion charges against him.

Moses tried to resolve the problem, but to no avail. He agreed to pay a penalty of $9.5 million ($110 million in current dollars), but had to face a trial. He was sentenced to three years in federal prison, but due to illness served two years. Moses died of a brain tumour a little more than a month after being released.

He left assets of $2.7 million and debts of $5.5 million, but the Annenbergs were not officially bankrupt, as revenues from the Inquirer and Daily Racing Form covered their debt payments.

Few of Walter's associates had confidence in his abilities, but he repaid Moses' debts and restored his family's standing.

Although he was a conservative, Annenberg had no patience for injustice. He banned classified advertising from the pages of the Inquirer that could be construed as racist, and made sure that the paper covered issues in the black community.

Yet, as Ogden points out, he maintained a blacklist of individuals and groups that were banned from the pages of the Inquirer. Furthermore, he adds, Annenberg had no interest in quality journalism. He considered the Inquirer an instrument "to give him the influence he desired."

In 1938, he wed Ronny Dunkelman, a Torontonian whose family had established Tip Top Tailors. The marriage lasted about a decade. Ogden says the couple, who produced two children, battled for social acceptance in a city saturated with genteel anti-Semitism.

Annenberg launched Seventeen, America's first teen magazine, in 1944, and he named his sister Enid as editor.

Sensing that television would be the next big thing, he applied for a TV licence, and got one in 1948. "TV is like the theatre," he said. "You can't enjoy it without a program." The "program" was TV Guide, which sold a billion copies a year when it reached its peak in sales in 1978.

Annenberg's friendship with Nixon blossomed when Nixon was President Dwight Eisenhower's vice-president. They were in agreement on the issues of the day, and Annenberg admired Nixon as a gritty, self-made man.

In 1968, Nixon appointed Annenberg as ambassador to Britain. He and his second wife, Lee, proceeded to refurbish the dowdy U.S. embassy in London.

When he presented his credentials to the Queen, in front of TV cameras, the Queen said: "You aren't living at the embassy at the moment, are you?" Awkwardly, Annenberg replied, "We're in the embassy residence, subject, of course, to some of the discomfiture as a result of a need for, uh, elements of refurbishment and rehabilitation."

The stilted remark, a function of his stutter, sparked a wave of hilarity and Annenberg became the laughingstock of London. He offered his resignation, but Nixon encouraged him to stay on. Despite this incident, Annenberg, the only U.S. envoy ever knighted by the Queen, proved to be a competent ambassador. When President Reagan offered to send him back to London as ambassador, Annenberg declined.

Although he was not a Jewish activist by any stretch of the imagination, Annenberg was a generous giver to Jewish causes. During the Six Day War, he donated $1 million to Israel. In 1991, he gave Israel $15 million for the integration of Soviet Jewish immigrants into Israeli society. In addition, Annenberg has made generous contributions to the Hebrew University, the Technion, the United States Holocaust Museum and various Jewish institutions.

After he sold his holdings to Murdoch, he established the Annenberg Foundation, which, in 1993, channelled $365 million to four American universities.

Asked to explain his generosity, he replied, "My country has been very good to me. I must be good to my country."

A simple but compelling credo.

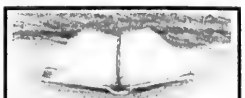
Cute, but insightful comments

By
RABBI REUVEN TRADBURKS



This week's parshah, Parshat Re'eh, Deuteronomy: 14, offers a cute but insightful comment on the kashrut laws.

The Torah singles out the pig and the camel as needing special attention with respect to their kosher status. The signs of a kosher animal are that it chew its cud and it has split hoofs. If you look at an animal and see that it has claws, like a lion, then you know it is not kosher. If the animal does not chew its cud, then again, it is not kosher.

When we look at the pig, we see that it has split hoofs. Look at the camel, we see that it chews its cud. The Torah therefore points out that the animal needs both of the kosher signs, both a split hoof and the chewing of the cud. The Torah specifically points to the pig and the camel as being non-kosher – although each has one of the kosher signs, it lacks the other.

There is a wonderful lesson concerning the posture of the pig and the camel. When the pig sits down, its feet stick forward, protruding in front of its body, as if to say, "Look at me, I'm kosher, look at my kosher feet." The camel sits with its feet folded under its body, where you can't see them, as if to say, "Look at me, I chew my cud, I'm kosher. My feet? Don't worry about them; they are hidden under my body, where no one can see them."

We all tend to act a bit like the pig and the camel in the way that we project our attitudes, our criticisms and our Judaism. We all have our strengths and our weaknesses, our mitzvot and our failings. Some of us excel at kindness, at chesed, at social concerns, and are weaker in our Torah learning, our Shabbat and our kashrut. Others of us are great learners, great daveners and meticulous in our kashrut, yet we fall short in our kindness, our concerns and our chesed. That is human nature – strengths and weaknesses.

Yet we have to be careful not to project ourselves in the manner of the pig, saying, "Look at me, I am kosher, I have split hoofs," yet knowing full well that we have our other not-so-kosher parts. Or like the camel, who says, "Look at me, I chew my cud," while we conveniently hide our non-kosher feet under our body so that no one can see our failings.

If we are strong learners and weak in our concern for proper speech, then we should not portray Torah learning as the only mitzvah of the Torah, conveniently hiding or neglecting the mitzvot involving speech. If we are great in our concern and action for Israel, then we ought not to neglect or even belittle the Torah, as if to project our kosher feet while hiding our not-so-kosher parts.

We always have to be careful to be honest and not project our criticism of our fellow Jews in a self-serving manner. We ought not to create the Torah in the image of man, projecting the important mitzvot as the ones that we keep, and the unimportant ones as the ones we do not. If we are weak in some areas of Torah, then along with criticizing others for their failures, we need to be honest and admit our failings.

Pigs and camels, strutting feet and hidden feet – cute lessons in honesty in our Judaism.

A historic victory

Six Days of War: June 1967 and The Making of the Modern Middle East*, by Michael B. Oren, Oxford University Press, $31.90.

"My faith in God has been restored." This was the fervent confession of a friend 35 years ago, after Israel's astonishing victory in the Six Day War. Such euphoria was understandable. Threatened with attack from belligerent Arab neighbours, Israel's response was brief, devastating and conclusive. In a surprise "pre-emptive" move, Israeli planes destroyed the bulk of the Egyptian air force while it was still on the ground.

In addition, Israel's lightning move through the Sinai Peninsula broke the Egyptian blockade of the Gulf of Aqaba and put Israeli soldiers on the banks of the Suez Canal. In the east, Israel's forces ousted Jordanian troops from the old section of Jerusalem and seized control of all Jordanian territory west of the Jordan River. Finally, Israel captured the Golan Heights, the fortified borderland hills used by Syria to harass Israel's north eastern settlements. Who could have anticipated such a debacle? Indeed, it seemed that the stars in their courses were fighting for Israel.

Yet, as Oren points out in this comprehensive history, Israel, despite its overwhelming success, was still incapable of imposing the peace it craved. Though roundly defeated, the Arabs could still mount a formidable military campaign. The status of territories could be negotiated, but the essential issues – Israel's right to exist, the demand for Palestinian repatriation and statehood – remained. "If the war was indeed a storm that altered the region's landscape, it also exposed the underlying nature of the Arab-Israel conflict – its bedrock. The modern Middle East created in 1967 was therefore a hybrid: a region of incipient promise but also of imminent dangers, a mixture of old contexts and new."

The author, a senior fellow at the Shalem Centre in Jerusalem, makes good use of recently declassified top-secret documents, both in Russian and Arabic, as he explores the war's military and diplomatic dimensions.

How can Israel's victory be explained? Among the reasons Oren offers was the overconfidence – bordering on fantasy – of the Arab leaders at the time. One high Egyptian officer believed that "the destruction of Israel was a child's game that only required the hooking up of a few telephone lines at the commander's house and the writing of victory slogans."

In dealing with the controversy about the Israeli attack on the American ship Liberty in the Mediterranean, which killed 34 and wounded 171, Oren concludes that the attack was a tragic mistake. Israel paid $12 million (US) in compensation to bereaved families and the United States downplayed the embarrassing incident.

In addition to the author's full and insightful account of why and how the war broke out and how it was concluded, there are also colourful portraits of the major personalities involved – Moshe Dayan and Gamal Abdul Nasser, Hafez Assad and Yitzchak Rabin, Lyndon Johnson and Alexei Kosygin.

This well-written, carefully researched and detailed history may convey more information then most readers want. But it is essential reading for anyone seeking to understand how an unprecedented victory 3½ decades ago has led to some of the seemingly intractable problems of today.

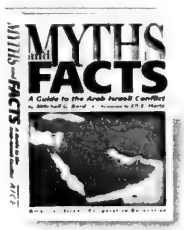
Arms control and the press

MYTH:

Arms control in the Middle East is impossible so long as Israel refuses to give up its nuclear weapons.

FACT:

Israel's assumed nuclear deterrent is an option of last resort, needed to offset the large imbalance in conventional arms, chemical weapons and ballistic missiles possessed by the Arab states. Israel has no incentive to unilaterally attack its neighbours with nuclear weapons whereas the Arabs – as history has shown – have both the capability and motivation to join in a war against Israel.



Arms control must therefore begin with a reduction in Arab military offensive capability. Arab "arms control" proposals have, in essence, only called for Israel to give up nuclear arms without offering anything substantive in return.

MYTH:

Israel gets favourable coverage because American Jews control the media and have disproportionate political influence.

FACT:

If Jews controlled the media, it's not likely you'd hear Jews complaining so much about the anti-Israel bias of the press. It is true that the amount of attention Israel receives is related to the fact that the largest Jewish population in the world is in the United States and that Israel greatly concerns American Jews. Large numbers of Jews do hold significant positions in the media (though they by no means "control" the press as anti-Semites maintain), and the Jewish population is concentrated in major media markets such as New York and Los Angeles, so it is not surprising the spotlight would be directed at Israel.

Politically, Jews wield disproportionate power in the United States and use it to advocate policies that strengthen the U.S.-Israel relationship; however, there is no evidence this has translated into favourable press coverage for Israel. It is possible to argue that pro-Arab forces, such as the petrochemical industry, have as much or more influence on the media and encourage an anti-Israel bias.

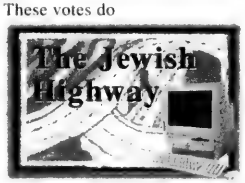
Internet warfare 2

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

Today, we continue our look at how sympathizers of Israel and the Palestinians are using the Internet to sway world opinion on the Mideast conflict.

Some of the most heated battles on the Internet take place at sites that permit online voting. These votes do not have the scientific validity of professional polls that use random sampling of the population. Nevertheless, when large Web sites such as Netscape or CNN hold online polls about the Mideast, advocates on both sides of the conflict fire off e-mails to sympathizers around the world in an attempt to skew the results.



The most famous example occurred last year, when MSNBC.com held a photo-of-the-year contest. One of the pictures in the running depicted the well-known picture, taken Sept. 30, 2000, of a 12-year-old Palestinian boy named Mohamed Al-Dura moments before his death at the Netzarim Junction in the Gaza Strip. MSNBC.com eventually decided to pull the contest because of what it called "electronic ballot stuffing... It became clear that individuals, through technical means, were voting for the same image hundreds, if not thousands, of times" [http://ojr.usc.edu/content/ejc.cfm?request=671].

You can also read an Egyptian take on this controversy at the Al-Ahram Web site [http://www.ahram.org.eg/weekly/ 2001/527/re4.htm].

Despite MSNBC's experience, online polls are still very popular. A current poll at Netscape asks whether international monitors should be sent to Israel and the Palestinian territories [http://wp. netscape.com/ex/shak/international/ packages/mideast]. But as the Web site itself admits, "Netscape polls reflect the views of those who choose to respond and are not scientifically valid surveys."

Another heated online battle is being fought by people who run online petitions. Several Internet sites have sprung up where people can marshal sympathizers in an attempt to influence public opinion. At the Petition Site, about 1,000 people have signed a petition to "Support our Israeli Allies and Stop Terrorism Against Israel" [http://www. thepetitionsite.com/takeaction/80979 4269]. Alternatively, there is also a petition to "End Alliance with Israel" which had 1,701 names [http://www. petitiononline.com/kr50k/].

But the petition that has been making headlines lately was started by European academics. In order to protest treatment of the Palestinians, they advocate a boycott of academics affiliated with Israeli universities. According to their Web site, about 700 European professors (and a handful from Israel) have signed a declaration that includes the following statement: "I will attend no scientific conferences in Israel, and I will not participate as referee in hiring or promotion [sic] decisions by Israeli universities" [http://www.pjpo.org].

In response, the Academics Against Boycott Web site was established and it has received the support of approximately 1,500 individuals from around the world who oppose the boycott. The site says, "If anything, academic contacts deserve to be cultivated as they are a proven path both to better science and to better understanding between nations... If one allows the flames of extremism to consume good judgment, the fire may become even harder to put out" [http://www.aaisc.net/].

Of course, boycotts against Israel are not a new phenomenon. The Internet has several sites that advocate boycotting Israeli labels such as Carmel, Elite and Jaffa and international brands like IBM, Starbucks and AOL Time Warner [http://www.inminds.co.uk/boycottisrael.html].

Aside from lending your name to an online petition, there are many opportunities on the Internet to engage in direct debate. Chat rooms and newsgroups allow advocates from both sides to face-off in front of a world audience. Before joining in, I recommend that you lurk (read other people's messages) for a while at [news:soc.culture.israel] and [news:soc.culture.palestine].

But be warned: these are not places for the faint of heart. A mix of passion and anonymity combine to create an almost unlimited supply of anger and vitriol.

U.S. army vet helped liberate Nazi camps

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

It's been nearly 60 years since Johnnie Stevens was on active duty in the U.S. army, but he still has the bearing and mindset of a military man.

He carries Purple Heart and Silver Star medals on his chest with pride, and the events of 1944 and 1945 are as vivid for him today as they were when he experienced them.

In April and May 1945, Stevens was a staff sergeant with the 761st Tank Battalion, an all-black fighting unit attached to Gen. George Patton's 3rd Army. As platoon leader, he helped free emaciated Jewish prisoners in German concentration camps. His unit rolled through four such camps in the waning days of World War II.

Stevens was recently reunited with Max Eisen, a Jewish survivor of one of those camps who the sergeant might well have gazed upon in those dramatic days.

As Stevens tells the story, it was near the end of the war, around 11 a.m. one morning in May, when his unit was given a mission to take a designated area in Austria. According to his map co-ordinates, the area was occupied by Wehrmacht (German army) and SS troops, but U.S. forces had no inkling that concentration camps were nearby.

Stevens was well aware of the kind of men he would be fighting. His unit had landed at Omaha Beach in Normandy 10 days after D-Day and had fought its way across France into Germany. They'd participated in the Battle of the Bulge and they'd had plenty of combat experience facing SS forces.

The SS, he said, "were indoctrinated killers… a well-oiled killing machine for the German government. That's what made them so bad."

On that morning in 1945, Stevens' unit, backing up infantry, fought the SS in a village and in the area around Mauthausen. The slave labour camp – Stevens isn't sure which one it was, but subsequent investigation indicates it was probably Ebensee, a satellite camp of Mauthausen – consisted of "long, drab buildings with barbed wire around them."

Inside was a nightmarish scene of walking skeletons and corpses piled up by the hundreds. "One of my men said, 'Hey Sarge, what the hell is that?' I was speechless. I couldn't believe men could be so weak. They couldn't hold their hands up, they were so weak. They couldn't speak.

"Even to battle-hardened soldiers like us, it was a shock. You're used to seeing guys shot, heads blown off, you expect it. But you don't expect to see people like skin and bones."

In May 1945, Max Eisen was a prisoner in the Ebensee labour camp. A native of Moldava, Czechoslovakia, he had been imprisoned in Auschwitz and in January 1945 was forced to take part in the infamous death march into German-occupied Europe.

He recalled his liberation in a conversation with Eli Rubenstein, national director of the March of the Living:

"I was looking at the entrance to the camp," he said. "All of a sudden, the gate came crashing down and a tank rolled through with a white star on it. I saw soldiers on the tank. I know now it was the 809th U.S. infantry division, with black soldiers that were manning the tanks.

"Their eyes were like saucers because they were absolutely shocked by what they saw. I was so happy. I was liberated. The Nazis were not going to kill me anymore."

Sgt. Johnnie Stevens (right) and Holocaust survivor Max Eisen discuss their wartime experiences as film director Fern Levitt looks on.

Eisen, 73, and Stevens, 82, met for the first time in Toronto at the premiere of Come Out Fighting: The 761st, a documentary by filmmaker Fern Levitt (for more on this film, please see David Silverberg's article in the arts section).

He and Eisen spent about an hour together comparing their experiences.

"I learned about the treatment inside the camp. He didn't know we were battling to take the area," Stevens said.

Stevens, the grandson of a slave, believes Jews under Adolf Hitler and the blacks in the U.S. South share a common experience. The racism that led Nazis to murder Jews was similar to the racism of Southern slave owners, who kept their slaves alive only because "they needed them for work," he said.

He's troubled by the recent distancing between U.S. Jews and blacks. "It's difficult for me to understand. The blacks and Jews always got along fine," he said.

"I never could understand what happened with this recent wave of division."

Stevens, who extended his stay in Toronto to participate in the recent March Against Antisemitism, remains sympathetic to the people of Israel.

"I agree with what Israel is doing [in its military operations versus the Palestinian Authority]. The terrorists are trying to put Israel in a state of fear. I admire them for not showing that fear.

"Fanatics dying for a country… to a guy like me, that makes no sense."

Stevens can remember Gen. Patton telling his troops that "the whole thing about dying for your country is a lie. The whole idea is to make the other guy die for your country. Those were true words."

A cypress tree was planted in Jerusalem in honour of Stevens' efforts to liberate Jews and he's addressed many groups on the evils of racism. His message to black kids on the subject of slavery and Jewish kids on hate is the same: "Don't let it happen again. Don't let your guard down, or it will happen again."

No more regrets now that school is over

By JASON ROTSTEIN

Maybe it wasn't supposed to happen this way. Life never turns out exactly the way we envision it.

Maybe I wasn't ready to leave school, although I never had an affinity for school and my studies the way some kids do. And it just so happened that when I was starting to feel comfortable in middle school, it came to a close.

Maybe I wasn't ready for high school until it was already upon me. I was just finishing one chapter in my life, while another was abruptly beginning.

Maybe I didn't invest in guidebooks. My conscience was my only guide.

Do you have a fishing line? Maybe that was Grade 9. Maybe that was just me.

Maybe I should have committed myself from day one. But I didn't, because high school wasn't what I had dreamed and we reject what we cannot face.

Maybe I should have listened to my parents the first time they said: "The years of high school are the highest years of your life." I should have yearned for the vast and endless sea and never looked back. Instead, I just let those moments, those days, those months, drift past me.

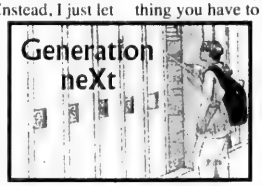
Maybe I began to believe in what the down-and-out used to say: "It's a nightmare." There were long days, those days when I wish I could have appeared before a world-court jury to justify my existence.

Maybe I didn't associate with anyone. What did it matter? I was on my way out.

Do you have a pen? Maybe that was Grade 10. Maybe that was just me.

Maybe I should've known you only get one shot at life. I didn't want to be in control of myself, my own destiny.

Maybe I should have taken those smiles, those brief moments of reprieve, for what they're worth. I didn't manage happiness. I was indolent. Happiness, you know, is something you have to work at on a daily basis.



Maybe I knew that I was stuck here for the long haul, but that meant I was bitter. I would have to sustain, in the place I learned to dread.

Maybe I wasn't quiet. I didn't listen to myself speak.

Maybe I didn't imagine anything would come of it all. Honestly, was this the place in which I would live out my formative years?

Maybe I didn't want to conform to social conventions, but I did it anyway to pass. I was conditioned by my experience.

Do you have a tree of heaven? Maybe that was Grade 11. Maybe that was just me.

Maybe I didn't realize my own potential until it was too late. Forever distracted by all that was going on around me.

Maybe I dabbled in blah and blah and blah, hoping to get stuck in something. It was my lame attempt at being observed.

Maybe I didn't do what I was supposed to do. But what exactly was I supposed to do?

Can I delve? Maybe that was Grade 12. Maybe that was just me.

Maybe this is ponderous. But times change.

Maybe I shouldn't be trying to rhyme. Whatever rhyme is, anyway.

Maybe I didn't maybe... But then again, maybe I did. Maybe, just maybe.

Pro-Palestinian library exhibit sparks controversy in Windsor

By RON STANG
Special to The CJN

WINDSOR, Ont. — The Windsor Public Library is reviewing the way it handles community exhibits after it received complaints about a pro-Palestinian one held on its premises in May, but the library's chief executive said principles of intellectual freedom will continue to be upheld.

Steven Salmons said he had received complaints from a family in the city's Jewish community about the exhibit, titled Palestine, The Great Injustice, which was displayed in the library's community window at its main branch downtown from May 9 to 24.

In addition, a letter to the editor in the Windsor Star, from a person who identified herself as a non-Jew, criticized the library for allowing an exhibit that "glorified" suicide bombings.

Letter-writer Dawn Markovic said the exhibit also attributed a "horrendous" quote to Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon, "although there is no proof of this. I know, I checked."

Harvey Kessler, executive director of the Windsor Jewish Federation and Community Centre, said he has spoken with library officials and he hope it will issue new guidelines governing such exhibits.

"That would certainly satisfy us, if [the library] has guidelines and they're enforced in the future."

Kessler called the exhibit "offensive" and said "some people viewed it as probably being propaganda and hateful towards our community."

The window, a display case on the library's first floor, is used by various organizations to display everything from arts and crafts to potentially controversial exhibits from anti-abortion and animal rights groups. The Jewish community itself has used it for Holocaust Remembrance Week.

Salmons said it's the first time an exhibit has generated controversy. He said complaints centred around the fact the exhibit was considered "anti-Semitic" and that the library shouldn't be involved in "sensitive, controversial, political issues."

He said he didn't know if the exhibit was anti-Semitic. "That's probably a question best brought to the Jewish community."

The library's concern is whether it "was… a hate crime. We didn't think it went over the line."

Staff-Sgt. Ed McNorton, of the Windsor Police Service said his department's street crimes unit carried out an investigation and forwarded the results to the Crown Attorney's office, which determined "there was nothing there that would lead to a successful prosecution, so no charges."

Salmons said "clearly there was an element of propaganda" to the exhibit and "because it was presented by the Arab community, it had a singular perspective… that's not to be unexpected from any community group's display."

But he said it's the job of the library to uphold the right to express controversial ideas, based on principles of intellectual freedom adopted by groups such as the Ontario Library Association and UNESCO's public library manifesto.

Salmons said it's "not for the library to decide truth, but to allow for an open debate and exchange of ideas and allow people to come to their own ideas of truth."

The controversy has led the library to review how it handles exhibits. Salmons said a new set of guidelines for window exhibits will be ready by September.

As part of those new guidelines, he said, community groups will be told "the point and purpose of the window" and the kinds of visual material that "make a good exhibit." He added that the public would also be informed that the exhibits do not represent the view of the library, and that names of sponsoring organizations should be clear and contact phone numbers and addresses provided.

For its part, the group that sponsored the exhibit, the Arab-Canadian Association of Windsor, denied accusations that it glorified suicide bombings.

Spokesperson Kifah Jawab said there "was nothing like that," though pictures of children in refugee camps were shown.

Jawab said the exhibit had three purposes: to show "the injustice" suffered by Palestinians since the 1940s,when "people living in a land for years are just driven away for no fault of their own;" to highlight UN resolutions calling for Israeli withdrawal from occupied territories; and to showcase the contributions of the 5,000-member local Arab community to the Windsor area.

Israeli consulate set to close

Joseph Gabay, president of Canadian Jewish Congress, Quebec region, (CJC-Q) shared that sentiment.

"Montreal is unique in terms of the Israeli presence," he said, referring not only to the high level of pro-Israel commitment in the Jewish community, but also to the unique bilateral relationship between Quebec and Israel, including a 1997 entente highlighted by a series of scientific, cultural and academic exchanges.

Gabay also said other communities in Canada are working to keep the consulate open.

Avital, who took on his diplomatic duties in the fall of 1999, said he was surprised by the decision to close the consulate, but not shocked by it, in light of Israel's being under intense economic constraints and pressure to cut 10 per cent from its budget.

He said the consulate has received "dozens and dozens" of telephone calls from members of the public upset by the news.

According to Rabbi Reuben Poupko, the consulate deserves to stay open, although he was not optimistic.

"The best way we can make a case for Israel in Quebec, for Jews and non-Jews alike, is with the presence of a consulate," he said.

In 1998, community leader Charles Bronfman, a longtime supporter of Israel's Labour party and a friend of Peres, intervened personally when the consulate was threatened with closure. There was an unconfirmed report that this time, Peres called Bronfman to inform him of the proposed closure.

Yoram Dori, a media advisor to Peres, told The CJN from Jerusalem that he could not "confirm or deny" the possibility. Abitbol noted, however, that Bronfman was in Israel at about the same time the consulate closing was announced.

The loss of the Israeli consulate would mean that Canada would be left with two diplomatic missions in Canada – the consulate in Toronto and the embassy in Ottawa. Avital said the embassy would take over responsibilities for Montreal and eastern Canada.

In a letter sent last week to Peres, Quebec International Relations Minister Louise Beaudoin pleaded with him to reconsider, referring to the "singular role this Israeli diplomatic post has played in serving the principal francophone community on this continent."

However, the greatest impact of the consulate's closure, Gabay said, is likely to be felt at the community level.

It has been almost unheard of to have a community event where the Israeli consul general is not present. The consulate has also held a special significance for the Jewish community's Sephardi population of 20,000 in francophone Quebec.

Yaffa Ben-Ari, a spokesperson for the Foreign Ministry, said in an interview from Jerusalem that it was as hard for the ministry to close the eight missions as it was for the missions themselves to hear the news, but there are few options in light of the slashed budgets.

The other missions set for closure included the Israeli embassies in Panama City, Minsk, Harare and Wellington, and the consulates in Rio de Janeiro, Marseille, and Sydney. Earlier in the year, Israel also shut its embassy in Asuncion, Paraguay. The closures would reportedly save the Israeli government $13.5 million.

Monitoring the northern frontier

According to Reports

By PAUL MICHAELS

Rarely a day goes by in Israel without a media report warning about the threat of conflict erupting between Israel and Syria along Israel's Lebanese border.

Some foreign media are also starting to pick up on this danger. On July 20, the Sunday Times reported that Syria's president, Bashar Assad, has ignored two separate warnings from Israel sent via the United States to end Syria's support of Iranian-backed Hezbollah and extremist Palestinian groups based in Damascus.

The paper quoted Maj.-Gen. Amos Malka, Israel's outgoing director of military intelligence, who warns that "sooner rather than later, we'll be engaged in a conflict with Syria unless Syria changes its attitude." This attitude – one of reckless belligerence – was recently explored in detail by defence analyst Gal Luft in last week's CJN (The three sins of Damascus). It is required reading for anyone who wants to understand the terribly risky game Assad is playing as he continues to provoke Israel by supporting Hezbollah in Lebanon.

UN Security Council Resolution 425 calls for "strict respect for the territorial integrity, sovereignty and political independence of Lebanon within its internationally recognized boundaries." In May 2000, Israel unilaterally withdrew its forces from south Lebanon, leaving its northern communities vulnerable to cross-border terrorist attacks. In contrast, Syria continues to defy Resolution 425 through its occupation and control of Lebanon, even while Syria sits as a non-permanent member on the UN Security Council.

Syrian-supported Hezbollah has established itself as the de facto power in southern Lebanon, much to Lebanon's dismay. As noted in the National Post editorial titled Insecurity Council (July 22), Assad recently sent tanks and 100 heavily laden military trucks into Lebanon to bolster his bases there, as well as to underscore Syria's support for Hezbollah, "one of the most dangerous terrorist groups in the world."

Resolution 425 calls for the UN's interim force for southern Lebanon (UNIFIL) to "assist" the Lebanese government to exercise its "effective authority" in the area. However, the UN has apparently acquiesced in the Hezbollah-Syrian takeover. The proof? Israeli soldiers have reported seeing Hezbollah's flag flying alongside the UN flag at a UN border post.

Oddly, this occurs at the same time as UN Secretary General Kofi Annan has issued a report on UNIFIL in which, along with Hezbollah, he criticizes the Lebanese government for failing to deploy its forces in the south: "Hezbollah's commitment to the launching of hostile attacks across the Blue Line [demarcating the Israel-Lebanon border] and the Lebanese government's unwillingness to fulfill its commitment to ensure full respect of the Blue Line contravenes Security Council decisions," Annan notes. Not unexpectedly, Faisal Mekdad, Syria's deputy ambassador to the UN, has staunchly criticized Annan's report.

Correction: In this column of July 4, the reference to the number of Iranian-supplied rockets to Hezbollah should have read "approximately 8,000," not "800,000."

Judge rejects appeal in Roma hate case

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO – An Ontario judge has dismissed a Crown appeal in a case involving a group of skinheads who were charged with promoting hatred against Roma (Gypsy) immigrants.

The decision upholds the acquittal of four adults and two youths who were charged in the case. In August 1997, the men had paraded in front of the Lido Motel in Scarborough carrying signs saying, "Honk if you hate Gypsies" and "Canada is not a garbage can." They also carried a Nazi swastika and a Confederate flag and some were seen giving the Nazi straight arm salute.

In an oral judgement from the bench, Judge Eugene Ewaschuk rejected the Crown's contention the trial judge should either have taken judicial notice that Roma and Gypsy are different names for the same group or permitted the crown to re-open the case and bring evidence to that effect.

Ewaschuk said he might have done so had he been the trial judge, but he declined to interfere with Judge Russell Otter's discretionary decision not to do so.

During the trial, Otter ruled there was no evidence before him proving the six men promoted hatred against Roma. Evidence at trial indicated only that their signs and statements were aimed at Gypsies, he said.

Otter's decision outraged the Roma Community and Advocacy Centre (RCAC), which argued at the time it was widely known that "Gypsy" is considered a synonymous – and pejorative – term for Roma.

"I wouldn't think it would be necessary, if this sign had said Negroes, to prove that Negroes meant blacks. I don't see why the connection even had to be made," RCAC spokesperson Ronald Lee said.

Ewaschuk also ruled the trial judge erred in not allowing Bernie Farber, executive director of Canadian Jewish Congress' Ontario region, to give expert evidence on racist groups. But Ewaschuk concluded that was not in itself sufficient to require a new trial.

Crown counsel Jamie Klukach said government lawyers are considering whether to appeal Ewaschuk's decision to the Ontario Court of Appeal.

Farber said Ewaschuk's decision, if it stands, "would have a very negative affect on minority communities, who want to believe the law is there to protect them."

Farber said the trial judge's decision rested on a single word – meaning that, in effect, the charges were thrown out on a technicality.

Farber also questioned the judge's decision to reject him as an expert witness, saying he has testified many times on similar issues.

OSCE resolution condemns anti-Semitism

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

On July 8, Sen. Jerry Grafstein mounted the podium in the reconstructed Reichstag building in Berlin. For the Toronto senator, it was a moment charged with conflicting emotions.

On the one hand, he was proud to be speaking in the German parliament in favour of a resolution designed to counter the growing anti-Semitic violence within the 55 OSCE (Organization for Security and Cooperation in Europe) countries.

On the other, he knew he was standing only a few feet away from the spot where Adolf Hitler announced in January 1939 that should war break out, it would lead to the annihilation of European Jewry.

"History plays strange tricks on us," Grafstein said. "It was a very emotional experience when I consider where I was standing, what I was saying.

"I felt there was a deep irony to stand in the Reichstag and ask for a resolution condemning anti-Semitism. I had very mixed emotions about the historical irony about that."

Grafstein delivered his speech at the 11th annual session of the OSCE Parliamentary Assembly, in support of an American-drafted resolution whose terms referred to "the alarming escalation of anti-Semitic violence throughout the OSCE region."

The resolution, which was passed unanimously, urged all states "to make public statements recognizing violence against Jews and Jewish cultural properties as anti-Semitic, as well as to issue strong, public declarations condemning the depredations."

It also urged member states to hold follow-up seminars to explore effective measures against anti-Semitism "and to ensure laws and regulations conform with relevant commitments to combat it."

The resolution is part of the Berlin Declaration and is the official OSCE policy, on par with such noted human rights documents as the 1975 Helsinki Accords. The resolution will proceed from the parliamentary wing of the OSCE to the government wing, where it will be implemented, said Grafstein, who serves as treasurer of the parliamentary wing.

The OSCE is the largest regional security organization in the world, including states from Europe, Central Asia and North America. It is active in conflict prevention, crisis management and post-conflict rehabilitation.

Grafstein, who co-sponsored a June rally at Queen's Park against anti-Semitism, said the rise of European anti-Semitism has had a profound impact on Jewish communities there. While in Berlin, he and his wife Carol visited a 100-year-old synagogue where they marked his father-in-law's yahrzeit.

Any distinctively Jewish decorations or wording had been removed from the building's facade – as has been the case with Jewish institutional buildings across Europe – and visitors had to pass through a screening process implemented by a private Israeli security firm.

Outside the building, German police provided a foot patrol.

Even in Denmark, whose king and citizens helped save most of the country's Jewish population during World War II, anti-Semitism has reared its ugly head, Grafstein said. The senator noted that a visiting soccer team from Tel Aviv was attacked and beaten on the field during a recent exhibition game.

Grafstein said Jewish parliamentarians he has met from Hungary, Italy and South Africa agree that last summer's anti-racism conference in Durban, South Africa, in which delegates openly espoused anti-Semitic views, has contributed to the current climate.

Canada has not remained immune to the scourge. In his Reichstag address, Grafstein pointed out that in the past year, "four synagogues have been scorched or burned, more than at any time in our entire history. In Canada, more than two incidents of anti-Semitism per day have been collated this past spring."

The Toronto synagogue in which he worships, Beth Tzedec, is imposing a $75 fee on members in order to subsidize security measures. The attacks on synagogues "infringes my freedom to worship as a Canadian," Grafstein said, a situation he called outrageous.

While Canada has experienced a major rise in anti-Semitic incidents, civil society has remained largely silent, he continued. "I heard a huge outcry from the churches about Israel's actions in recent months, but I haven't heard a huge outcry in Canada about anti-Semitic incidents from government leaders, community leaders and church leaders.

"The silence has been deafening."

Grafstein said he plans to ask the Senate to refer the anti-Semitism question to a standing committee, who will be asked to investigate the current situation in Canada and suggest steps that can be taken to ameliorate it.

"Which is the right course that a man should choose for himself? That which is an honour to him who does it and which also brings him honour from mankind"

U of T grad joins mission to visit Jews of Cuba

By ADAM GRACHNIK
CJN Intern

Elisheva Gould was one of 12 Canadian Jews who recently went to Cuba to work alongside the local Jewish community.

"The goal was to help them [Cubans] be more self-sufficient. To teach them, so they could teach others and be progressive," said Gould, 23, a recent University of Toronto graduate sent on the trip by Jewish Campus Services of Greater Toronto.

The idea for the 10-day mission came from Israel Pupko, who is originally from Mexico and is now the Israeli shaliach to Canadian Young Judaea.

"We felt we could meet face to face and cater to the needs of the community [in Cuba]. We wanted to work side by side, engage the community and share our resources," said Rachel Lasry, 28, international program director at Ve'ahavta, a Canadian Jewish humanitarian and relief organization, which spearheaded the trip with Canadian Young Judaea.

Other trip sponsors included the UJA Federation Board of Jewish Education, Canada-Israel Experience, Canadian Jewish Congress, Regional Jewish Communities of Ontario and UJA Federation of Greater Toronto.

For the first three days, the group worked with 100 local Cuban Jews at a camp sponsored by the American Joint Distribution Committee (JDC), which sponsors relief, rescue and reconstruction programs.

The Canadians helped by implementing programs, taking their directions from the Spanish-speaking counsellors sent by the JDC.

Gould admitted that the language barrier made it tough for everyone, but "it [the camp] was amazing at the same time."

"Jews came from all over Cuba. [Their] level of Jewish knowledge was different," Gould said. "Most didn't know how to pray. [But] they came to camp wanting to learn and know more.

"They know there are other Jews out there. They're so starved for Jewish contact and sense of community. This is one of only a few organized things. They don't take it for granted."

At the camp, they danced to Israeli songs, celebrated Yom Ha'atzmaut, taught about Jewish holidays and had, as Gould described it, "an amazing Friday night kabalat [Shabbat] ceremony."

She said the most moving experience of the trip was their work in two Jewish cemeteries, one Ashkenazi, the other Sephardi, both on the outskirts of Havana in a mainly Afro-Cuban neighbourhood. Years of neglect, underfunding, vandalism, grave robbing and trespassing have left the cemeteries in shambles.

The Canadian group, who ranged in age from 20-30, found many tombstones smashed and a variety of items inside the above-ground, hollow cement monuments.

Gould said the local population practises a form of Santeria, a Caribbean-based religion whose followers believe in spirits, sacrificing, magic and voodoo.

"It was really intense and traumatic," she said about finding voodoo dolls, chicken bones, coconut shells, and on one occasion, a human femur inside the hollow stones.

When asked if she thinks the grave desecration is anti-Semitic, she said, "It's kind of a tough call. It probably doesn't come from anti-Semitism. Jews just have a special [different from Santeria] sense of traditional burial rights and respect for their dead."

But it's still troubling to see grave robbing in a Jewish cemetery, she added.

Gould had previously visited Jewish cemeteries in Poland, Ukraine and other European countries on the March of the Living and on another sponsored mission to Ukraine that she participated in when she was a student at Hebrew University.

Many of the graves in the two cemeteries date back to the period around 1945, when there were 25,000 Jews on the island. However, a variety of political factors, including the ascent to power of Fidel Castro's revolutionary government in 1959, have weakened the Jewish community and the population has dwindled to 1,200.

The Communist government didn't believe in religion and there was, and still is, a lack of money for shuls and Jewish programs. Many Jews fled; others intermarried and became assimilated, the Canadians learned.

"Down there, Jewish can mean [your] father is [Jewish], or grandmother is," said Lasry

She estimates that 98 per cent of the population is intermarried, but added that recently, many of the non-Jews who have married a Jew end up converting to Judaism.

She said every six months a rabbi is flown in from Mexico to do about 50 or 60 conversions. "I heard stories of a man as old as 60 getting a bris."

In 1992, the Cuban government officially changed from an atheist state to a secular one. This benefited the community, Lasry said.

"Cuba has become secular and Jews are allowed to express themselves, get together and flourish," she said, adding that previously, shuls were used for many things, including as a gymnasium.

Nonetheless, Gould said the community, like most Cubans, is still quite poor. She said that, thanks to donations from Israel's Book Store, Negev Book Store and Miriam's Book Store, her group was able to bring books, school supplies, toys and even a tallit and kippot with them on the trip.

Lasry said they still need many items and Gould said that most importantly, they want close personal relationship with other Jews.

"The more the better," Gould said.

91-year-old reflects on life as a pharmacy pioneer

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

Beth Sky has the distinction of receiving an award as the only surviving graduate of the University of Toronto's pharmacy class of 1932.

The active 91-year-old former pharmacist was presented with a gold medallion of the Chancellor's Circle at a recent ceremony at the U of T's Hart House.

The following day, she received a certificate of distinction on the 70th anniversary of her graduation from the Ontario College of Pharmacy at a dinner at the Delta Chelsea Hotel.

Interviewed in her north Toronto condominium, Sky, who believes she was the first Jewish woman in Ontario to graduate in pharmacy, spoke to The CJN of the many changes that have taken place in her profession.

Born in Toronto, she attended Harbord Collegiate. She says she became interested in pharmacy "when, as a child, I became impressed watching Manny Starkman, who then worked at a drug store on Dundas at Palmerston Avenue."

She recalls that she "had a very hard time finding work, because at that time, they didn't like women in pharmacy, particularly, they didn't want a Jewish person."

But the former Beth Kates didn't give up. While apprenticing at a store at 87 Yonge St., she met a young pharmacist, Norman Sky, at a dance at Casa Loma. He invited her to complete her apprenticeship at a pharmacy that he and his brother, Jack, operated at Bloor and Clinton streets.

She accepted and the move greatly affected her future. She married Jack in 1930.

"He used to kibitz with me that it was cheaper to marry me than to pay me $4 a week."

She continued to work with her husband, who had graduated from pharmacy in 1929, at his store at Davenport Road and Uxbridge Avenue after the brothers each opened their own pharmacies.

Sky, who still drives her car, says much has changed since she graduated.

"Today, there are many women and ethnic people working as pharmacists. And pharmacists must know much more than back then – there are so many new products now."

She adds that things are less personal today. "Years ago, customers were like friends. And the small corner pharmacy is becoming obsolete."

Sky's attractive home is filled with photographs of her two daughters, Florence Pape and Linda Grossman, and their families – five grandchildren and seven great-grandchildren.

Her husband Jack died six years ago and she speaks with pain of the death of a granddaughter, Paula Lipson.

"I have lived through many things in my life," she says. "I am proud to say that my children and their children are all university graduates."

The nonagenarian says she has slowed down somewhat, "but I am enjoying my life with my children, grandchildren and great-grandchildren."

Pape, a former teacher, describes her mother as an ingenious and thrifty woman, and says her sense of humour is legendary.

A movie buff, Sky recently told her children that she would have no problem if actor Richard Gere wished to park his shoes under her bed.

"To tell you about our mother would probably take in excess of 91 years," Pape says.

New journal for geriatricians launched

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

A new, local medical periodical was founded recently by Michael Gordon, primarily for physicians responsible for patients over 50.

The publication, called Journal of Geriatric Care, appeared for the first time this past winter and will be published every two months in Thornhill.

Gordon, who is president of medical service and head of geriatrics and internal medicine at the Baycrest Centre for Geriatric Care, head of the division of geriatrics at Mount Sinai Hospital, and professor of medicine at the University of Toronto, is the journal's editor-in-chief. He leads an editorial staff of 12 and an editorial board of 10.

In the publication's first editorial, Gordon explained that the organizers "decided on [beginning the subject matter at] age 50 because many of the conditions that become apparent at about that age are predictors of the future process of aging and of one's function during later years.

"An understanding of the mechanisms of diseases during the 50s and 60s and appropriate intervention may very well improve the prospects of a healthy later life," Gordon said.

Each issue of the peer-reviewed publication will also have a guest editor and will include case studies, book reviews and drug reviews devoted to one topic on geriatric health care. The first issue, for instance, January/February 2002, concentrated on cardiovascular disease, and featured articles about the management of hypertension and the safety of the drug Viagra for those with coronary heart disease.

The March/April issue, which focused on infectious diseases and the respiratory system, included articles on chronic obstructive pulmonary disease, the pneumococcal vaccine and antiviral therapy. Future subjects to be covered include oncology and the muscul-skeletal system. The journal's Web site allows readers to download a selection of articles. Because the journal is a peer-reviewed publication, its material will be scrutinized by experts in the field, like the most respected scientific publications.

The Journal of Geriatric Care will "meet the need of the medical community to pay more attention to the needs of the elderly," Gordon said.

He said it will include information from pharmacists, social workers and nurses because many aspects of medical care for the aged overlap.

Nurses, for example, often know more about the development and care of pressure ulcers than physicians do, he said. But he added most of the journal's authors are physicians.

Gordon began his medical career in internal medicine and has been at Baycrest for 25 years. He says he gets a real satisfaction from caring for the elderly.

"People might think that [geriatrics] is depressing, but it isn't," he said. The elderly, he said, don't lose either their personality or their sense of humour.

"I'm amazed at how much fun they can be" as they share stories of their lives, and the perspective they develop because of the wisdom they have accumulated, Gordon said.

For more information on the journal, visit the Web site at www.journalofgeriatriccare.com, e-mail mail@journalofgeriatriccare.com, or call 905-669-1814.

The Truth About Warsaw

a folktale from Eastern Europe

Berel was very excited. At last, he was going to see the great city of Warsaw he had always heard about! He bid his wife and children goodbye, and left the small village of Chelm for the first time in his life.

The road to Warsaw was long, and after several hours, Berel began feeling tired. I think I should take a break now, he thought to himself. Maybe I should go to sleep. But wait! How will I know which way to go when I wake up? I know! I'll point my shoes in the direction of Warsaw, and when I wake up, I'll go that way! Pleased with his ingenious solution, he took off his shoes, pointed them towards Warsaw, and went to sleep.

But the brightness of the day made it hard for him to fall asleep. He tossed. He turned. He didn't realize that he had kicked his shoes, and now they were facing Chelm. Finally he gave up trying to fall asleep. He stood up, ready to start walking again. Well, which way's Warsaw? He looked down at his shoes. That way? All right. He put them on, and continued his journey. He walked for several hours until…

Well, here I am, at the great city of War… wait a minute! This isn't such a big city! I guess all the stories I heard about Warsaw were made up! Let me see what's here. How strange! That well looks just like the well in Chelm! And this street! It looks just like my street! This house looks just like my house! And that cow in front looks just like my cow! How odd! That woman in the window! She looks just like my wife! I guess Warsaw's just like Chelm! I might as well go home now. There's nothing here to see! Berel left the city and began walking home.

"Hey, wagon driver!" he called to a passing wagon. "Yes?" answered the driver, turning his head.

"Could you possibly take me to my house in Chelm?"

"Why certainly."

Berel climbed into the wagon. He was very tired. As soon as he sat down, he fell asleep.

"We're here!" the driver told him. "Get up!"

Already? thought Berel. It seems like I was only asleep for a few minutes! He shrugged, paid the driver, and walked up the steps to his house. He couldn't wait to tell his wife the truth about Warsaw!

The fighting brothers

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

Everyone who has a brother or sister fights with them – that's part of growing up in a family. It may be because the brothers or sisters are jealous of each other, or because one has something the other one wants, or because they can't agree on what television program to watch.

Most of the time, these disagreements blow over fairly quickly.

But there were once two brothers whose argument didn't blow over, and the results were very serious indeed.

You have probably heard of the story of Cain and Abel in Genesis, the first book of the Bible. Cain and Abel were the children of Adam and Eve, the first humans.

Sandy Eisenberg Sasso, who has written several wonderful books based on stories or legends from the Bible, such as God's Paintbrush, God Said Amen and God in Between, has written a new book, called Cain & Abel; Finding the Fruits of Peace (Jewish Lights, 2001). Illustrations are by Joani Keller Rothenberg.

In Sasso's version of the story, Cain and Abel lived "in God's garden called Earth." It was a very beautiful place, where "the earth was warm and soft, and fruit trees grew in abundance."

Cain was a farmer. "He loved to dig in the earth and harvest the vegetables and fruits. He knew how to take the wheat of the field, grind it into flour, and bake bread." Abel, on the other hand, was a shepherd. He watched over his sheep as they grazed, and "gently guided the strays back to the flock. He would shear their wool and spin it into soft yarn to make blankets."

The two brothers were very close. But one day, they began to argue about whether God liked farmers or shepherds better. One day, Cain got so angry that he threw a rock at Abel and hit him on the head, killing him. Sasso says that "the gash in Abel's head appeared as a mark on Cain's own." Cain felt very sorry and ashamed. "It was as if Cain had destroyed an entire world."

The pictures in the book are drawn in vivid colours. They change with the story. In the first part, when Cain and Abel are loving to each other, there are lots of white and soft shades. Once trouble comes, the illustrations are harsh and dark. You will find lots to talk about when you read Cain & Abel. Sasso suggests that you discuss what the brothers could have said to make things different, as well as what makes you feel angry and what you can do to bring back the different kinds of fruit.

The potential to achieve greatness is there for all of us. Grow from within. Change the world around you. We have the ability to make the world shine. We really do!

Holocaust restitution agreement in jeopardy

insurance regulators, Jewish organizations and five insurance companies. ICHEIC, he claimed, has been causing the delays, though he did not speculate about the reasons.

Singer should tell ICHEIC "it is time to finish these long negotiations," Gibowski said.

"I know Singer very well and appreciate him as an honest and fair person," Gibowski added. "I can only think that he is not well-informed."

At the Luxembourg meeting, Singer said his group could reject the funds from the German firms and inform U.S. federal judge Michael Mukasey "that we reject the granting of closure and that they will have no business in the United States."

Several years ago, during reparations negotiations, it was implied that U.S. insurance regulators could withdraw licenses from German firms.

"We are not threatening anything now," Singer said. "We are holding out a hand in friendship and saying, 'Have the generosity to pay the people while they are still alive.'"

Gibowski, however, said there is "no reason" to withdraw legal closure.

"We are doing everything on the German side. The foundation is there, the money is there. So what is the reason?" he asked.

Gibowski said the insurance companies have nothing to gain by postponing payments, since they do not have to lay out additional funds.

Gibowski suggested that claimants or those with questions might do better by going directly to the German insurance companies or to the German Insurance Association than to ICHEIC. He said it made sense to test the system by transferring 1,000 claims or questions directly to the German companies, to see how fast they were handled.

ICHEIC has been criticized for its high administrative expenses and its poor oversight of the agencies hired to handle inquiries from survivors and process insurance claims.

The Claims Conference board meeting marked the 50th anniversary of the signing of the Luxembourg Agreement on reparations, a contract signed by the West German government with Israel and the Claims Conference.

In the ensuing half-century, the Claims Conference has succeeded in distributing more than $50 billion (US) in reparations for more than 500,000 survivors.

Insurance policy restitution is among the more recent arrangements worked out by the Claims Conference, the 10-year-old World Jewish Restitution Organization and the State of Israel.

It involves primarily German and Italian insurance firms, along with some Swiss and French firms.

According to Gibowski, many Nazi-era bank and insurance claims were settled in the immediate postwar years. Many German Jews were poor and had very small policies, if any, he said.

In the summer of 2000, German insurance firms agreed to pay about $225 million (US) as part of a $5 billion (US) fund from German government and industry.

The last hurdle in creating the fund, which deals primarily with reparations to former slave and forced labourers, had been the question of legal closure – in other words, protection for German industry and insurance companies against further lawsuits by survivors.

Aside from the Italian firm Generali, most of the affected insurance companies are not following the guidelines established by ICHEIC, a Claims Conference spokesperson said. An ICHEIC report released in May by private consultant Lord Peter Archer of Sandwell in England found that many insurance companies were too quick to deny claims.

The report, which also criticized some of ICHEIC's internal operations, found that the insurance companies often demand impossible levels of proof from survivors or heirs of policy holders. The report said some firms have rejected claims after performing cursory searches.

The Claims Conference said German firms in particular have failed to provide names of Holocaust-era insurance policies for the ICHEIC Web site (www.icheic.org). The list, which aids claims researchers, currently has about 54,000 names.

The German companies are "working right now to produce lists of Germans who are Jewish and who lived in the Nazi time in Germany," Gibowski said. "If there were a master list somewhere saying those had insurance policies and those had something else, this would be easier. We can only produce lists of names of German Jews. If... your name is on the list, you can ask your questions."

Some 500,000 Jews lived in Germany when the Nazis took power in 1933. Gibowski said the German firms have been "asking for more than 1½ years to receive potential claims and questions" from ICHEIC "in order to check them. They haven't received a single claim until now."

But Claims Conference leaders said some companies are demanding levels of proof that are impossible to meet today.

"Companies have to recognize that years and years after the war, it is not possible to provide the same documentation as if it were a few years ago," said Gideon Taylor, executive vice-president of the Claims Conference. "The level of frustration is enormous, particularly among Holocaust survivors."

Survivors and their heirs have complained that neither ICHEIC nor the insurance companies are fulfilling their moral and financial obligations. Many expect the Claims Conference to speak on their behalf, and at the Luxembourg meeting their anger was palpable.

"How long will they let [Singer] keep on saying, 'Keep cool'?" asked Julius Berman, chair of the organization. Singer "is putting his reputation on the line" with the survivors.

Singer noted he had received letters of congratulations on the 50th anniversary of the Luxembourg Agreement from German Chancellor Gerhard Schroeder and from Romano Prodi, president of the European Commission.

Families of Maccabiah victims upset

By HENRY BENJAMIN
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

SYDNEY, Australia — The families of four Australian athletes who died in a bridge collapse at the 1997 Maccabiah Games are outraged that a man found guilty of negligence in the disaster was appointed to new positions in the Maccabi sports movement.

Both Maccabi World Union and Maccabi Israel recently found new jobs for Yoram Eyal, who served six months of community service for his part in the accident.

In July 1997, as the Australian team was making its way across a hastily constructed footbridge to the opening ceremonies of the 15th Maccabiah Games in Israel's Ramat Gan stadium, the bridge collapsed, hurtling the team into the murky, polluted waters of the Yarkon River. Four members of the team died and 70 were injured.

Eyal, the head of the organizing committee for the international games who commissioned the ill-fated bridge, was sentenced two years ago. Four others were also sentenced to jail time.

Maccabi World Union has appointed Eyal head of the North American desk and has given him back his old $120,000 (US) job as head of Kfar Maccabiah in Ramat Gan. Maccabi Israel has made him responsible for the registration of the country's sports clubs.

Colin Elterman, whose daughter, Sasha, was seriously injured in the accident, is the spokesperson for the families who lost relatives in the disaster.

"We will not rest until this man has been removed from any official Maccabi position," he said. "Maccabi should not have a convicted criminal in any role within its organization."

He plans a media campaign to inform international Jewish communities and Israeli taxpayers, who pay part of the fee for the Maccabiah Games, of Eyal's appointments.

Phil Filler, president of Maccabi Australia, said: "When Eyal's appointments were announced at the world conference, they were met with resounding applause. The Australian delegation sat on their hands."

Eyal has said that he will never again take part in organizing a Maccabiah, but added, "I didn't elect myself to those bodies. I have paid the price according to the courts and I don't think I need to stay home for the rest of my life."

Maccabi Israel chair Igal Carmi and Maccabi World Union president Jean Futeran told Filler that Eyal had served his sentence and deserved another chance.

But not everyone in Israel agrees.

Sports Minister Matan Vilnai brought the appointments to the attention of the Knesset.

The Israeli daily Yediot Achronot received more than 200 complaints from readers condemning the appointments after it published the story.

Zvulun Orlev, head of the Knesset's sports and education committee, said of Eyal's appointments: "This was not a smart decision. There has been no thought given to the feelings of the Jewish people of Australia."

Getting past the first few pages

In order to establish credibility in the Arab world, all documents must first denounce Israel, Mark Heller explained sardonically over coffee at the Tel Aviv Museum.

The principal research associate of the Jaffee Center at Tel Aviv University was commenting on a recent United Nations publication written by prominent Arab intellectuals titled, The Arab Human Development Report.

Backgrounder

The document began with the usual Israel-bashing familiar to most publications in the Middle East but went on to state that Arab countries must get past their obsession with the Jewish state and begin a stage of self-criticism, Heller told our group, adding that this might signify a positive change in Arab thought.

I was on a press tour to Israel with other Toronto journalists interested in Middle East affairs. As we set out on our cultural mission to hear Israeli and Arab writers talk about the current crisis, I couldn't help but wonder if the views from the United Nations report had made their way into the Arab communities we would be visiting in the Galilee and the West Bank.

On the second day of the trip, we met Salem Jubran, co-director of Givat Haviva – a joint Arab-Israeli centre for peace – on a patio overlooking the offices of the Communist party headquarters in Nazareth. Jubran is a former Communist leader, a writer and educator who teaches and lectures on the Holocaust to Jewish-Arab groups.

Over the years, the people of Nazareth have overcome many challenges in order to share the city peacefully. However, when the Arabs of the city began to riot in early October 2000, the Israeli police responded. When the confrontation was over, 13 Arabs were dead and a commission was established to investigate the incident.

In this atmosphere of unrest, Jubran, who is also editor of al-Ahali, an Arab newspaper in Israel, spoke to us about the "unfairness" in President George W. Bush's recent speech calling for Palestinian Chairman Yasser Arafat to step down and elections to be held in the Palestinian Authority.

Noting that "more is expected from the Palestinians than from Egypt or Jordan," Jubran never got past his anger at Israel and the West to discuss the implications of the suicide bombings.

Unfortunately, as the Jewish co-director Sara Ozacky Lazar pointed out, Jubran had to leave the meeting before his writings were even mentioned.

The next stop was at the Druze village of Daliat al Carmel on the outskirts of Haifa. Both sides of the main road leading into the village were lined with shops filled with Israelis and Arabs bargaining for carpets, blouses and Jerusalem pottery.

It was surprising these days for a carload of English-speaking Canadians to empty out on the streets of the Druze village and our group was especially welcomed by the shopkeepers trying to sell their goods.

We were meeting Salman Natur, an author of 24 Arabic books and one Hebrew novel, Walking on the Wind. This time, I was determined to hear Natur discuss his works.

Natur spoke to us over pita, hummus and Turkish coffee, and it soon became apparent that here was another writer who had very little interest in talking about his writing. He was intent, however, on describing his attachment to the land and his views on what he called "Israeli colonialism."

As he spoke, Natur began to romanticize about his affinity to the Sephardi Jews, whom he described as "Arab Jews."

Turning history on its head, Natur asserted that the Arabs of the land – Jew and non-Jew – shared a common heritage and a bond of friendship that could withstand any crisis.

In an effort to redefine the nature of the conflict and cast Israel as the colonizer, Natur told us that "the European Jewish occupiers" were merely tourists in this land.

Ironically, the very people who were considered outsiders and Semites when they resided in pre-World War II Europe were now being described by Natur as "unwelcome visitors to this place."

The Jewish biblical claim to the land was dismissed by Natur as irrelevant, and the harsh Arab treatment of Sephardi Jews was shrugged off as unimportant.

It was astonishing to see how Natur had recreated the historical narrative to support his primary agenda – the Arabization of the land and the elimination of the Jewish State of Israel.

Later in the week, we heard from Bir Zeit University international relations professor Ali Jirbawi that "suicide bombings need to be put into the context of the occupation."

Jirbawi went on to defend the Palestinian right of return and the need for a unilateral state. Once again, there was no recognition of a Jewish state or acknowledgement that Jews had any claim to the land.

Abdel Mallek Jabbar, an engineer and academic who was involved in the economic development of the West Bank before the current intifadah, complained about the unfairness of the long waits his family had to undergo at the offices of the Israeli National Insurance to get his newborn daughter's inoculations.

Author of A Stranger in the House and advocate of a two-state solution, Raja Shehada did allow himself to criticize Arafat. But he then added that the Palestinians would never have followed Arafat if it hadn't been for Israel and the settlements.

"The settlements are at the heart of the problem," Shehada said.

The issues of Muslim fundamentalism, Arab nationalism and anti-Semitism were never debated at serious length in any of our discussions.

What became clear as the trip drew to its conclusion was that, at this point, the Arab leaders we met never did get past the first few pages of the Arab Human Development Report.

A shift to 'mega-terrorrism?'

By SHELDON KIRSHNER

Mideast Analysis

In recent months, Palestinian terrorists have attacked or have tried to disable strategic sites inside Israel.

This raises a troubling question: Are the Palestinians changing tactics in a bid to inflict still greater devastation on Israeli civilians and property? Are they turning to "mega-terrorism?" The evidence so far suggests that a shift may in fact have occurred.

In late April, Israeli commandos foiled a plot to topple two skyscrapers in Tel Aviv. In May, Israel's biggest fuel depot was targeted.

Just as ominously, the Palestinian who carried out the Passover massacre in Netanya, which killed 29 people, intended to release cyanide gas and thus kill yet more Israelis.

Still more alarming, six Palestinians arrested in Israel in June planned to destroy an arms warehouse near Beit Shemesh in which nuclear weapons and Jericho surface-to-surface missiles are stored.

Last but not least, Salah Shehadeh, the Hamas military leader whom Israel assassinated last week in the Gaza Strip, was planning a "mega attack" that could have killed hundreds of people, Israeli Defence Minister Benjamin Ben-Eliezer said last week.

If these potentially calamitous terrorist plots had succeeded, Israel would have reacted with all due fury and the Middle East would have been plunged into utter chaos.

Israel's occupation of the Palestinian autonomous areas, which could last months or years, has reduced the tempo of bombings and shootings to which Israelis have been subjected since the eruption of the intifadah 22 months ago.

But no one can rule out the prospect of new attacks, particularly those whose sole purpose is to cause as much devastation and grief as possible. In the meantime, the Israeli government is closely studying the aforementioned incidents, hoping that valuable lessons can be gleaned from them.

On April 26, Israel, acting on intelligence warnings, intercepted a truck loaded with about half a ton of high explosives.

Documents found inside the truck, which started its fateful journey in the West Bank town of Qalqilya, indicated the driver wanted to park the vehicle in the underground parking lot of the Azrieli twin towers, detonate a bomb by remote control and bring down the skyscrapers.

The driver of the truck was a member of the Popular Front for the Liberation of Palestine, whose secretary-general in Qalqilya, Raed Nazal, had recently been slain by Israeli forces.

The plot to demolish the Tel Aviv towers, the pride and joy of Montreal real estate developer David Azrieli, resounded with echoes of the past. Richard Reid, the Al Qaeda terrorist who recently attempted to down an American Airlines jet, had reportedly visited the Azrieli towers last summer.

The terrorists who sought to blow up the Pi Glilot depot, which is on the outskirts of Tel Aviv and contains up to 3,000 tons of fuel, came perilously close to setting it alight.

News reports suggest that an unknown terrorist attached a remote-controlled bomb to a truck parked overnight in an industrial district in Holon, a Tel Aviv suburb.

The following morning, the truck was driven to the fuel dump, which is near an upscale residential neighbourhood and the campus of Tel Aviv University. As the driver was filling up his truck, a blast threw him to the ground. The flames were doused by automatic sprinklers and by workers in the vicinity. If the fire had spread, the resulting explosions might have created a fireball that could have wreaked widespread death and destruction.

The Palestinians may be planning still more audacious operations. Gen. Doron Almog of the army's Southern Command said last month that Israel should gird itself for non-conventional attacks against strategic targets. As he put it: "At the moment, it is important to know that there are no specific non-conventional threats, but we must prepare for the possibility in the future."

Chilling words.

The Week in Israel

July 22

• Police said they had uncovered a terror cell linked to Palestinian Authority President Yasser Arafat's Fatah group. The cell was allegedly involved in killing suspected Palestinian collaborators.

• Foreign Minister Shimon Peres said Israel had recently transferred more than 10 per cent of tax revenues owed to the Palestinian Authority since September 2000.

July 23

• Saleh Shehadeh, head of Hamas' military wing in Gaza, whom Israel holds responsible for hundreds of terror attacks, was killed when Israeli planes bombed his house. The raid killed 14 civilians, including Shehadeh's wife and three of his children. About 100,000 people joined the funeral procession for the dead. The attack drew heavy international criticism, including a strong rebuke from the United States.

• Deputy defence minister Dalia Rabin-Pelossof, daughter of late prime minister Yitzhak Rabin, resigned from the government, saying it was not carrying on the diplomatic legacy of her father.

July 24

• Military officials questioned the use of a one-ton bomb to kill Hamas leader Saleh Shehadeh. Political officials also said better intelligence about nearby civilians would have led to the operation's postponement.

July 25

• Eran Mulai, an Israeli police officer who lives in the West Bank, was arrested on suspicion of selling arms to the Palestinians.

July 26

• Palestinians fired an anti-tank missile at an armoured civilian bus in the Gaza Strip.

Novelist Potok worked to bring Jews together

By PETER EPHROSS
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

Obituary

NEW YORK — Chaim Potok was a novelist who paved the way for a younger generation of religious American Jewish writers – and a Jewish scholar who worked tirelessly to bring Jews and Judaism closer together.

Potok, who was raised in an Orthodox home but later became a Conservative rabbi, died last Tuesday at his suburban Philadelphia home of brain cancer at age 73.

The best-known of Potok's more than 15 works, including The Chosen and My Name Is Asher Lev, describe Orthodox Jews struggling with maintaining their faith in a secular world.

"He is a major figure in the American Jewish literary canon," said Daniel Walden, a professor emeritus of American studies, English and comparative literature at Penn State University. "His essential mission was to explore the core-to-core cultural conflicts of our civilization, and in doing so he exposed what the Jewish experience was like, what the Jewish religion was like."

Some of Potok's interest in these "core conflicts" stemmed from his own experience in the Korean War, where he encountered Korean Buddhism as a U.S. Army chaplain – an experience he later fictionalized in The Book of Lights.

Indeed, he opened the religious Jewish world up as much to non-Jews as to Jews.

Years after The Chosen was published, Potok received letters and e-mails from nuns and priests, as well as Protestant clergy, thanking him for writing the book, Walden said.

Earlier Jewish writers, such as Bernard Malamud, Philip Roth and Saul Bellow, were religious skeptics. But Potok wrote from within the Jewish religious tradition, Walden said.

As a result, he served as a model for the next generation of American Jewish writers – such as Allegra Goodman, Nathan Englander and Myra Goldberg – who wrote about the religious experience.

Potok chafed at being labeled a Jewish writer, but when he tried to write about other subjects – in, for example, I Am the Clay, a book about Korean refugees – he was less successful.

"He was pigeonholed as a Jewish writer, and the few times he tried to write his way out of that, his public wouldn't let him," said Ellen Frankel, the editor in chief of the Jewish Publication Society (JPS).

Potok's most famous book, The Chosen, focuses on Danny Saunders, who is raised in a chassidic home in Brooklyn.

Saunders' attraction to the more tolerant world of his friend Reuven Malter puts him at odds with his father, who wants him to remain within the chassidic world.

The story was familiar to Potok. He spent a fervently Orthodox childhood in New York, where he was born to parents who had emigrated from Poland.

"My father, especially, wanted me to be a professor of Talmud in a yeshiva. This business of writing at first seemed frivolous to him. When it persisted, he didn't know what to make of it," Potok said in an interview two years ago.

Even though he never fulfilled his father's expectations, Potok did become a Judaic scholar.

In 1965, he earned a doctorate in philosophy from the University of Pennsylvania, writing his dissertation on the German Jewish philosopher Solomon Maimon, a contemporary of Immanuel Kant.

The last year of his doctorate was spent in Jerusalem, where he also wrote The Chosen. He worked on one project in the morning; the other in the afternoon, Potok once said.

From 1966 to 1974, he was editor-in-chief of the JPS in Philadelphia. During his tenure, he launched JPS' series of Bible commentaries and emphasized the publication of children's literature.

For more than 15 years, he served as chairman of the editorial committee, which oversees JPS' acquisitions.

"The only meeting he missed" during that time "was the very last" – two weeks ago, when the cancer that he had long battled was finally overcoming him, Frankel said.

Frankel met with Potok several times a year at Hymie's, a Philadelphia-area delicatessen, where Potok usually ordered a bagel and a coffee.

The bearded Potok was sometimes warm and effusive, and sometimes silent and brooding – but he was always very intense, Frankel said.

"Often, you would ask him a question, he would think for a moment, then he would cut right to the chase," she said.

Potok was the literary editor of JPS' five-volume Torah commentary. During the 1990s, he adapted and edited that commentary into one volume that is used in Conservative synagogues throughout North America – even though the project took him away from his writing.

Though he found his home in Conservative Judaism, he spoke passionately about the Orthodox community, which he believed had grown too narrow-minded.

"The yeshiva is the foil I strike out with. Or the foil I strike out against," he once said. "Fundamentalism is an absolutely wrong reading of Jewish traditions."

In addition to My Name Is Asher Lev and The Chosen, Potok addressed this world in several other works.

Potok won a variety of awards for his fiction, including the Athenaeum Prize for The Promise and the National Jewish Book Award for The Gift of Asher Lev.

Potok was also a passionate lover of Israel – where he lived for several years – but "he was not Israel right or wrong. He felt he had the right to express an opinion," Frankel said.

Potok also was engaged in the Soviet Jewry movement. In 1997, Potok published a book on the subject of Soviet Jews, The Gates of November, that focused on the Slepak family, well-known refuseniks who moved to Israel after gaining their freedom.

Potok is survived by his wife, Adena; two daughters, Rena, a Philadelphia-area college professor, and Naama, an actor in New York; a son, Akiva, who is a filmmaker in California; and two grandchildren.

Careful growth plan working for long distance service

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

Charles Zwebner has made long-distance calling as easy as 10-15-945.

The 43-year-old native of London, England, is founder and president of Yak Communications Inc., an international, long-distance discount dial-around service.

By dialing 10-15-945 before a call, customers can make long-distance calls at discount rates without switching their local telephone carrier, such as Bell Canada, Telus Corporation, or MTS Communications Inc. in Manitoba.

Zwebner and his wife Leora, who now have five children, settled here in 1981, and he graduated from York University with a bachelor's degree in science and business administration.

He founded Yak in 1998 after selling Card Caller, Canada's first fixed-amount, prepaid telephone calling card, which he had developed in 1991.

The idea behind Yak is to give consumers savings on their long-distance calls, and have these calls show up on their local telephone bill.

Currently, Yak rates are as low as seven cents a minute to Canada and the United States, 12 cents a minute to Israel and nine cents a minute to the United Kingdom.

"The advantage is that there is only one bill to pay. There are no surcharges, there is no credit application to fill out, and there are no contracts. Callers simply dial and talk, and rates are available 24-7-365," he said from his office near the Scarborough Town Centre.

"It's a concept that is quickly catching on. When I started up with three employees five years ago, there were dial-around services available in the United States, but in Canada there were literally no players."

There are now 30 employees in Yak's offices, and 3,000 monthly, recurring customers in Ontario, Quebec, Manitoba, Alberta and British Columbia.

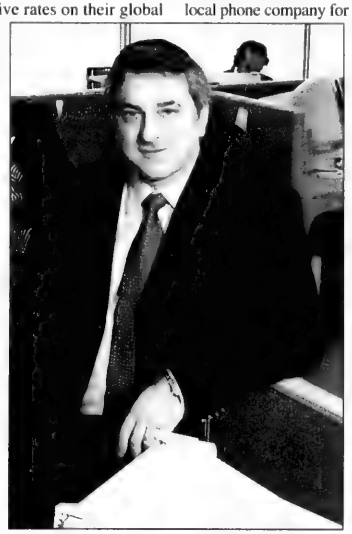
"Customers are based primarily in ethnic communities, so traffic stems from the urban centres in which they live," he said.

In May, after 18 months of finalizing licensing and billing requirements with U.S. carriers and deploying lines, Zwebner launched his first U.S. venture in Las Vegas, Nev.

"Las Vegas is the fastest growing city in the United States, and surprisingly, 97 per cent of its residents are not Las Vegas natives, so there is a lot of long-distance calling going on.

"The city attracts people from everywhere, and for many of its [residents], family and friends are still in Mexico, Central and South America, Asia, the Middle East and Europe.

"Those with international roots were demanding less expensive rates on their global calls, so Yak committed itself to giving international callers in Las Vegas great savings and simple long-distance service."



Charles Zwebner

On July 1, Yak began servicing the Miami area, and then Zwebner plans to move into New York and Los Angeles.

He also intends to "roll out" his product in other U.S. gateway cities such as San Francisco, San Diego, Houston, Dallas, Philadelphia, Washington and Chicago.

"We want to duplicate in the United States what we are doing here. Because we have a good relationship with U.S. carriers, consumers can rely on getting good service; they get the same quality as they would with their own carrier," he said.

He acknowledges that some people may be leery about switching carriers because they do not want to fill out credit applications or give personal information, and they are unsure of other company's billing systems. "They are afraid of the unknown. With us though, it is very simple; they see on their bill the call they made with the rate we quoted."

Yak's state-of-the-art technology, Zwebner said, enables them to run the entire company from their switching system in downtown Toronto.

"Technology today is such that you can run a telephone system from anywhere in the world, for anywhere in the world. It's all fibre optics and SS7 signalling, which is a carrier language that enables different carriers to 'talk' to each other. That enables us to market service worldwide from here.

"When someone makes a telephone call, they get switched to our system, we process the call, we take those records and send them to the local phone company for billing and collection, and we then pay the carrier their share," he said.

In the United States, he said, dial-around calling is a $4- to 5-billion market, out of an overall long-distance market of about $80 billion, while the overall Canadian long-distance market is about $5 billion, said Zwebner.

Yak, which is the largest of the three dial-around companies now operating in Canada, has a run rate of about $50 million a year, "and the company is growing. We're adding 15,000 to 20,000 customers a month," he said.

As rates have fallen, he said, people are making longer calls. "Whereas an average long-distance call used to be three minutes, it is now seven minutes."

Although they know who their customers are, he said, "we tend to leave them alone. There are no mailings and we do not approach them. It's a no-gimmick service. We're not here to bother you. We're here to give you savings, and the savings can be substantial, he said.

"Most phone companies in the long-distance market are charging a monthly fee, so a person who is making $12 in phone calls is probably also paying about $4.95 to be on that phone company's plan.

"With us, the caller would pay about half of the $12 for his calls, and would not be paying the monthly fee, so we're talking about a 60 to 70 per cent saving on the phone bill."

His business is volume based, he said. "We have volume purchasing power, and we pass that savings on to the consumer. We will buy millions of minutes to destinations, and the more we add, the cheaper it gets for the consumer.

"The trend has been for our rates to go down. When we started, Yak rates to Israel were 21 cents a minute, and we're looking to be somewhere this year in the 10 cent range. Rates, on the other hand, never go up. They may sit at the same spot for awhile, but we do not raise them."

While some companies charge about 79 cents a minute to countries such as Morocco, said Zwebner, Yak charges 49 cents. "We're talking about 30 cents a minute savings."

Zwebner is proud, he said, that "in the past four years, not one employee has left; morale is high and it's a great team. They like what they're doing."

Overseeing Yak's various departments, including accounting, customer service, technology and marketing, is an 80-hour-a-week job, he said.

"Right now, my primary focus is both our expansion into the United States, and our plans to take the company public, which should happen this summer.

"That will catapult the company onto a different level and allow us to pursue some acquisitions. It will also attract some executive employees from other companies, and give us a higher profile with the carriers and suppliers," he said.

Many dial-around companies have "fallen by the wayside because they have over-expanded, taken upon too much debt, or made acquisitions which were over-valued. There has been a huge shake-out in the past two years.

"We've continued to grow on a step-by-step basis and we have attracted clients from competitors who have fallen apart. We are running a lean company; we didn't take on debts, we didn't expand too much too fast, and we didn't duplicate networks. That's the secret of our success."

Zwebner, a member of Agudath Israel Synagogue since 1981, stresses that his 80-hour work week runs only from Sunday morning until Friday afternoon.

"Shabbat is for my family. It is time for me to get energized for the rest of the week and get fed for the rest of the week."

Actress's role is full of chutzpah

By KATHRYN KATES
Special to The CJN

This summer, Montreal-born actress Michelle Polak is playing Hermia in CanStage TD High Park's production of William Shakespeare's A Midsummer Night's Dream.

CanStage is marking its 20th anniversary of its first show in High Park with the play about a mystical forest inhabited by fairies, which runs until Sept. 1.

Polak's excitement about the role is obvious when she describes the story.

"Hermia is a wonderful character," Polak, 29, says. "I start the play with incredible conflict and high stakes. My father wants me to marry Demetrius. It would be a marriage of money and politics, but my heart is with Lysander. My father brings me to the Duke to have me marry Demetrius or be put to death by execution.

"Hermia is very feisty. She's a modern woman who knows what she wants. She's full of chutzpah, goes after her heart and what she believes in. At 19 years old, she's right at that beautiful split where adolescence and young womanhood begin. As a young woman, you start making your own choices in life even if they are disastrously wrong," she says.

As Hermia, Polak engages in physical fights, which should be a breeze for her. While attending Ryerson Theatre School from 1992-95, she was the first woman to win the Patrick Crean Award for Outstanding Actor Combatant with Distinction.

In addition to combat scenes, Polak and the other cast members play the music with a wide array of percussion instruments that imitate eerie sounds emanating from the woods.

Polak says she loves the whole experience.

"The first week we started rehearsals, I felt I was in summer camp," she says. "Early morning, we would do round-table script work, later in the morning we'd do music, and in the afternoon, we would do fight choreography and movement."

With a cast of 24, the play is the largest show Polak has acted in since she was in school.

"It is an enormous show – a huge undertaking. This production has been adapted. It usually takes three hours, but our director, Richard Greenblatt, has cut it to two hours, so that people who sit on the hill don't complain about sore tushies," she says.

Polak, who now makes her home in Toronto, says theatre is her main passion, although she has worked in television and film.

"I don't have an interest in being in People Magazine," she says. "That kind of acting I can leave for all the other actors."

Sick of the industry's commercial aspects, Polak stopped acting in 1999 for a year and went back to school. She entertained thoughts of becoming a midwife, but eventually realized she had to do what she loved.

"When you love what you do, you risk everything," she says. "I'd rather risk, so I came back and jumped without the net and community theatre caught me. I've worked consistently ever since, which is almost unheard of in this town."

The actress is booked until Nov. 10. In August, she will be doing double duty, moonlighting in the Dream in Little Dragon at Theatre Passe Murailles Mainspace. In the early fall, she will be seen in Recto-Versal In Machin-E – the first woman to perform this solo female piece – which originated in Quebec – in English. October finds her in Two Little Words at the Tarragon Extra Space.

A Midsummer Night's Dream begins 8 p.m. nightly, except on Mondays. Tickets are pay-what-you-can, with a suggestion of $15, and children 14 years old and under are free, courtesy of TD Bank. For more information, call the Dream Hotline at 416-367-1652, ext. 500.

Three Shakespearean roles for Posner

By ADAM GRACHNIK
CJN Intern

Fresh out of high school, Rami Posner left his hometown of Winnipeg and spent two years with the Israeli Defence Forces. Now, in a major career shift, he is performing in his third season at the Stratford Festival.

"I draw a lot of parallels between the army and acting," says Posner, 27, who entered the Israeli army in 1991. "[It has] a lot to do with discipline. Being in the army was one of the most valuable experiences in my life. I learned a lot of skills that I still use in my life today."

After returning from Israel, Posner attended university in Winnipeg, where he discovered his love for acting. He took an introductory theatre class and by the time the course had finished, he knew he had found his passion.

He applied for and was accepted into the BFA acting program at the University of Alberta, where he played many roles, including Doctor Shpigelsky in A Month in the Country by Ivan Turgenev.

Shortly after he graduated, he was hired to perform in Stratford.

"It's such an incredible place," he says. "[It's a] piece of cultural history of the country. [It's] such an honour and reward to be here," he said. "You work with incredible actors. It teaches you and you're able to amass tools that you can apply anywhere."

This season, Posner appears in three Shakespearean plays. He plays Edward in Henry VI: Revolt in England, Palamon in The Two Noble Kinsmen and he makes a brief appearance in Henry VI: Revenge in France.

As Palamon in The Two Noble Kinsmen, he battles his cousin, Arcite, for the love of Emilia. The two are captured and imprisoned while fighting for Thebes against Athens. Posner says the play illustrates why he enjoys acting.

"I like to be able to do things. I can't [act as I] do in normal everyday life," he says, referring to the fact that he literally "fights it out" for the girl.

Of his role as Edward in Henry VI: Revolt in England, the first play in a three-part series, Posner says, "It is a thrill to play royalty. Edward is an intensely complex character. [He] likes all the good things in life. It leads to his downfall."

The story of Henry VI is set during the War of the Roses and involves a battle for King Henry's throne among the kings' noblemen. The Kingdom is thrown into civil war and divided under two banners, the Red Rose for the ruling king and the White Rose for the rival.

Posner said the play is pertinent to the modern world.

"[It's] very realistic... [the] struggles for power," he says. "Watch the play and see how it pertains to politics in today's life."

Posner has also teamed up with his brother Ari, 30, as a composer. This year, the duo were the first-place winners of the Stratford Festival of Canada's Composition Contest for Young Composers for their composition of Under the Greenwood Tree from the Shakespearean play As You Like It.

"I come from a musical family," Posner says. "I was pushed in a good way towards the arts and always felt something in performing arts."

Henry VI: Revolt in England runs until Sept. 28 and The Two Noble Kinsmen runs until Sept. 29.

Musician strikes a chord with folk

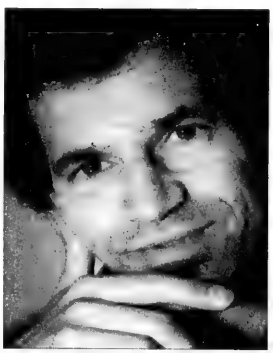
By DAVE GORDON
Special to The CJN

The eerie and electric instrumental prelude reverberates, holding the notes in anticipation of a 15-song storybook by Noah Zacharin. The tales are sometimes reflective, sometimes hopeful, but always musically endearing.

Zacharin's just-released fourth CD, Crow Dark Wind, is a rollicking blend of finger-snapping folk rock and lovesick blues twang, all laid out on a shifting rhythmic bed of guitar grooves.

But the new disc, which has been well-received by critics and fans alike, almost didn't see the light of day, because Zacharin says the songs were "trapped" in his head.

"[They] wouldn't stop yowling in my head, 'Let us out, let us out,'" Zacharin says. "So I figured my only hope for relief was to do the work needed to give them a home outside the confines of my own cranium."



Noah Zacharin

Zacharin, who won't reveal his age, has been listening to that muse since he picked up his first guitar at age nine. He wrote his first song at 15 and began performing his own material at 17.

"Songs often begin when I'm playing guitar and stumble onto some sequence of notes or chord or riff that I haven't played before," he says.

"What I do constantly is write and play, which I do each morning while I have my first coffee. It has become a ritual of discovery and slow awakening, far more generous than the alarm clock and frying eggs and hurtling towards a taxi or a traffic jam."

The new disc, which Zacharin self-produced in his home studio, combines developed harmonies with skillfully penned melodies. The lyrics of the acoustically simple Midnight exemplify the foreboding yet reflective mood of Zacharin's work: "touch upon/ the round imperfect earth upon which we are adrift... venom & saliva & fire."

Zacharin describes the CD as "darker than any beer, yet energetic; in love with every ferris wheel and merry- go-round and hot-dog stand and woman and man I've ever come across."

Honing his lyrical chops in the Montreal poetry scene before moving to Toronto in 1987, Zacharin has published hundreds of poems, reviews and translations internationally. He has also written many songs, and has produced four full-length recordings of his own material as well as a number of collaborations.

Zacharin shies away from comparisons to other Jewish musical poets like Bob Dylan and Leonard Cohen. But he says his Judaism does inspire his art.

"The consciousness that I am a Jew forms much of what I write; sometimes God appears as a theme in my songs," he says. In fact, where music and God meet, Zacharin often leads services at his synagogue. But guitar is his first love, and he values the effect his music has on his listeners.

"When people tell me they're really impressed with my playing, I say, 'That's good, but were you moved?'" he says. "Music is an expression, not an athletic event."

Zacharin's next show will be in Toronto on Aug. 24 at Clinton's. For information on CDs or upcoming concerts, visit www.noahsong.com. Next year this time, expect to see another new disc.

Masters squash player shows no sign of aging

By ELI SHUPAK
Special to The CJN

Robbie Osher says he's getting quite close to the end of his career as a competitive squash player, but the 63-year-old three-time defending Canadian Masters champion (60+ division) shows no signs of slowing down on the court.

Osher has won at every level of the game since first picking up at a racquet at the age of 31 in his hometown of Johannesburg, South Africa. In fact, he can't find enough competitive matches among his contemporaries, so he has resorted to playing more youthful opponents in lesser events.

Osher won the 50+ invitational spring tournament in April, shortly after capturing his second straight Ontario Masters title in the 60+ category.

He went on to defeat Toronto's Peter Hatcher, a member of the world doubles squash champion team (60+), at the Canadian championships for the second year in a row in straight sets 3-0 (9-1, 9-4, 9-7) early last month at the Glencoe Club in Calgary.

"I play down in minor tournaments," said Osher in an interview at his downtown Toronto office, where he's the CFO of a real estate firm.

"I play in my age group at the provincials and the nationals because I want to be a provincial champion and I want to be a national champion."

While Osher – who has won all the tournaments in his age group since the start of last year – admits to being quite close to the oldest man on today's squash circuit, he says he has changed over time from a very fit player to a wise and skillful player.

He finds it very difficult to run these days, has a bit of arthritis and a little wear and tear of the joints from playing the game at such a high level off and on over the past three decades.

"You adjust for your age by not running so much… by playing the shots that get the opposition out of position," said Osher, who competes against guys 35 and older.

"It's all in the head. I've been in the game for over 30 years, so I work out strategies. I try to play on the weaknesses of younger players," Osher said.

Time restraints forced him into taking up squash after playing tennis for a lengthy period. At the outset, he put worked a lot on his game and within three years he reached South Africa's top level.

Osher was playing upward of eight matches a week of high-level squash at the time against guys in their 20s.

He grew tired of the game and left it for a number of years until he was old enough to play in more senior age groups. In the meantime, Osher took up long-distance running, eventually competing in marathons.

Osher returned to squash at age 43, and from 45 on he won all kinds of provincial and national titles in South Africa in the 45+, 50+, and 55+ divisions. He was undefeated in provincial matches from 1986 to 1994, the year he was voted South Africa's Provincial Veteran Squash Player of the Year.

Osher proudly recalls representing his country at the Maccabiah Games on three different occasions, winning six medals (one gold, four silver, one bronze) in the process.

"I think the camaraderie amongst us as Jews was fantastic," said Osher. "I can remember all the opening ceremonies where Jews from all over the world were there. For many hours, we just mixed with everybody. It was the greatest."

As a father of three daughters, the oldest of whom was already living in Canada, Osher says he felt the need to pack up and move the rest of his family here six years ago because of the insecurity in South Africa.

With retirement looming in a couple of years, Osher expects squash will remain a big part of his life both on and off the court.

"I've gotten so much out of the game, I want to give back all the experience I've had wherever I can," said Osher, the chair of Squash Ontario's competitions committee since 1997 and a volunteer coach to today's up-and-comers. "I find that I'm involving myself with a lot of volunteering work just on the squash side.

"I just want to take it easy, play socially. The competition's been great for me. It's given me a lot of recognition and a lot of self-assurance as well."

Maccabi Canada gearing up for 2003 games in Venezuela

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

Maccabi Canada is planning to send 150 athletes and administrators to next summer's Pan American Maccabi Games in Caracas, Venezuela.

They will join an estimated 2,000 athletes from 15 Western hemisphere nations, along with contingents from Israel, Australia and Britain at the games, which are held every four years between Maccabiah competitions in Israel. The Pan Am games are sponsored by the Latin American Maccabi Federation.

Although the Canadian team is far from set, it appears Canada will be well-represented in basketball, with five teams participating. Canada will send a boys junior team (14-, 15- and 16-year-olds), a boys youth team (17-, 18- and 19-year-olds), an open men's team (adult), a women's open team and a master's (over 40) team.

Canada will also be well-represented in baseball with a boys youth team as well as open and master's softball teams. Organizers are hoping veterans of the 1985 Maccabiah Games softball tournament – the games' first-ever medal event in softball, in which Canada earned a silver – will attend, making it a reunion event, said Allen Gerskup, chair of Maccabi Canada's national athletic committee.

Other Canadian contingents will likely include men's and women's 10-pin bowling teams, a junior bowling team, tennis athletes, golfers (mostly masters), a men's water polo team, a men's beach volleyball team, junior boys soccer and as many as a dozen triathletes (both men and women).

Almost all events will take place at the Hebraica, a community campus with outstanding athletic facilities. "It's like a walled city… a real Olympic village," Gerskup said.

In addition to the athletic competition, organizers have scheduled cultural and social events for every night of the competition, which runs from July 20 to 27, 2003.

Maccabi Canada has appointed a number of coaches in the various disciplines and they are currently scouting talent for the national team.

Unlike the Maccabiah Games in Israel, the Pan Am Maccabi Games are not subsidized and each participant is being asked to pay their own way. Total cost will be $3,700, which includes airfare, hotels and food. Spouses, parents and other family members are invited to join the Canadian team, Gerskup said.

For more information, check out Maccabi Canada's Web site at: www.maccabicanada.com.

Twenty-something: an introduction

BY Jodi Kovitz

Hi. I'm Jodi Kovitz, and I'm known as the following: entrepreneurial, ambitious, creative, fun, caring daughter, sister, granddaughter and friend. You might also see me as (although I hate to admit it) a typical 20-something Forest Hill Jew.

This means that I come from an upper middle-class background. I had a bat mitzvah, attended a Jewish day school, a predominantly Jewish high school and a Jewish sleepover camp. I graduated with a semi-professional degree from the University of Western Ontario and will be heading off to law school in the fall. (Yes, you might think that a stereotype applies here.)

My prescribed role includes the following: become educated and successful, marry Jewish and essentially always be good. Talk about pressure.

Despite all these expectations, I have begun to ask myself some questions. What is expected of me as a 20-something Jew? Do I continue to practise Reform Judaism? If I fell in love with a non-Jew, what would that mean? What does it mean to be Jewish today? Is it spiritual? Is it a cultural identity? It is a religion? Is it in my genes?

Through conversations with my peers, I have discovered that I am not alone in my search.

My first attempt at writing this column turned out like a philosophical dissertation that read like War and Peace. In reviewing my work, I realized that I had written a piece that tried to meet the expectations I feel I have to live up to – rather than just being me. Recognizing this started me thinking about the first time I became aware of how important my Judaism is to me.

Oddly enough, this occurred when I was far from my cozy Jewish community, living in Milan surrounded by Roman Catholics. You would not believe how difficult it was to find a seder there for Passover. After scouring the Web, I ended up in a seniors home, singing the four questions in Italian.

What's funny to me is that the awakening of my adult Jewish identity happened when I was so far away from everything that I thought defined me as a Jew: family, friends, community and expectations.

When I returned from Italy, I revisited this undeveloped part of my identity and my desire to further explore how Judaism could fit into my life. I began to address these questions through a course offered at Kolel, The Adult Centre for Liberal Jewish Education, taught by Rabbi Elyse M. Goldstein, called Judaism and the Quest for Spirituality. We discussed traditional and modern rituals, sex, money and how to live with the cultural expectations.

The course enabled me to continue to build my Jewish identity and introduced me to other 20-somethings trying to figure it out. Together, we formed a group called Reviving Eden. The objective of our educational and social activities is to provide opportunities through which 20-something Jews can explore concepts of Jewish identity.

An opportunity to join us for a weekend of fun and spiritual exploration is coming up in August. Check out www.kolel.org/revivingeden. I will refer to events being put on by various groups in Canada that I think are relevant to this column.

From Starbucks to synagogue, we search. What do we face, being Jewish and 20-something? How do we deal with the expectations we feel have been placed on us by our parents, our peers and our communities?

It's clear that I'm no Tolstoy, but I feel pretty good about using this column to try to get a dialogue started. I will share my reflections on my own journey in dealing with some of these issues, and I encourage you to participate. Feel free to contact me at jlkovitz@hotmail.com.

Epi on Education

Seymour Epstein

Here we are in the midst of a sunny Canadian summer. Is anyone thinking of Jewish education? In fact, wherever one turns, one finds Jewish learning going on. We need only to get away from our rigid definitions that confine learning to schools to see the true picture of Talmud Torah k'neged kulam, the study of Torah as pervasive and comprehensive.

First, though, there are Jewish schools in operation over the summer. Those schools that follow more traditional notions of "Jewish time" as governed by the Hebrew calendar continue to operate through part of the summer and take their breaks bein hazmanim, between the periods.

There are also summer camps that add study to their schedule as naturally as they include baseball, swimming and hiking. There are religious camps (of all persuasions) and Zionist camps (also of every variety) whose very programs are an ongoing lesson in Jewish living.

Adult education continues in the summer in synagogues and community organizations. Jews attend services over the summer in city shuls and country shuls, and every prayer service contains an element of study.

Rabbis prepare over the summer to lead their congregations in meaningful prayer during the High Holy Days, and their preparations involve text study.

The members of our community who study a folio of Gemarah or a chapter of the Tanach each day do not interrupt their regimen over the summer.

All of this is to say that Jewish education is much more than schooling. It was designed as early as the Bible as an activity for all ages, at all times, in all places, and in all settings. Ironically, it is only since the advent of public education in the 19th century that Jews, like others, came to think of education as limited to the classroom.

Summer and winter, town and country, young and old – Jewish learning is always as close as the bookshelf or the computer screen. As Hillel said: Zil g'mor, Go and study...

Epi (Seymour Epstein) is the vice-president of Jewish Education at UJA Federation of Greater Toronto.

GREEKTOWN ON THE DANFORTH

GreekTown on the Danforth: Canadian heritage in the making

More than a tourist area, GreekTown on the Danforth is a community. In the summer, when the trees reach their full green and Toronto's restauranteurs put out their patio tables, GreekTown puts on its Mediterranean face.

Here, when friends and acquaintances greet, you are as likely to hear "Kalí' imeral Ti kanis?" as "Hi! How are you?" In the restaurants and cafés, you hear patrons converse in every language of the world.

While the music of Greek polysyllables will appeal to your ears, the most important thing is not the language, but the fact that people do greet each other. Bustling and busy as the community is, everyone — not just tourists, but everyone who lives and works here — is as liable to stroll as to hurry.

There is plenty on the Danforth to woo your senses, and make you want to slow your steps: bright color and exotic decor; the sounds of the bouzouki; the aroma of lamb souvlaki wafting from a grill; and the tastes of exotic foods. It is the restaurants above all — and the atmosphere they help create, at once lively and relaxed — which draw people from all over the city and beyond.

Many restaurants capture, in their decor, the pleasing colours and terraced style associated with the Greek islands and mountainsides. And while souvlaki is everywhere on the Danforth, its dining establishments take pride in offering the full range and flavours of Greek and other Mediterranean cuisines.

But the Danforth boasts many other fine ethnic restaurants as well. To name but a few, Japanese, Italian, and East Indian cuisine are well represented. And its cafés and dessert houses are unparalleled, both in number and quality.

GreekTown is also home to Toronto's finest natural and specialty food stores and many alternative health practitioners. And it's become a leading fashion destination, with a host of fine specialty boutiques for men, women, and children, as well as European-quality beauty salons and spas.

Enjoying a reflective pause in GreekTown

There is plenty of live entertainment here. At many establishments, audience participation is the rule, though after a fine, full meal, you may feel disinclined to dance on a tabletop.

There are a few other Toronto streets which are wider in actual metres, but the Danforth has an expansive feel about it which you don't find anywhere else. Majestic trees shade well-kept homes; here and there are streetside parks, where you can sit and rest your feet.

If you look closely, you see there is a solid community here. You see not only the tourists, but also the elderly and the children, as they shop, stroll or sit and chat in the cafés and parks. In the restaurants, waiters and bartenders offer everyone prompt, friendly service; there are plenty of regular guests whom they greet by name.

Nor is it just staff who do this. You will see the owners showing guests to their tables, greeting them warmly; in GreekTown, customers are family.

Also here are the institutions that belong in any healthy city neighborhood: schools, houses of worship, clubs, and community centres. People not only work here, they live here; and it is in great part because they keep GreekTown pleasant to live in, that it is pleasant to visit.

If you really want to get to know the community, chat a little with the staffs of different restaurants; you'll find that everyone knows everyone else. There is plenty of competition here, but it is friendly. To thrive, a restauranteur has to cherish the firm conviction that his or her establishment is the best; but in GreekTown, they do so without knocking the competition. If anything, the reverse is true.

It is from this wealth of restaurants that the "Taste of the Danforth" festival was born. This annual event has become so popular that GreekTown is closed to traffic for its duration. It's a great opportunity to sample the Danforth's culinary delights while enjoying its ambience, all in support of worthy charities like the Toronto East General Hospital Foundation.

While the Danforth is a community, it has never been a closed enclave. Saul Korman of Korry's Clothiers, an active member of the Jewish community, is also an enthusiastic promoter of GreekTown. Having been there for half a century — Korry's is now celebrating its 50th anniversary — Korman knows the people of this community, many of whom started as dishwashers and short-order cooks in the '50's and '60's, then opened the first modest Greek restaurants in the '70's. Many of them came here seeking both prosperity and freedom; the late Andreas Papandreou (a recent Prime Minister of Greece) lived in Canada from 1969 to 1974.

Korman shares with the people who live and work on the Danforth their joy in the prosperity and freedom of Canada. If you come to GreekTown, you are breathing, hearing and tasting Canadian heritage — not in a museum, but as contemporary history in the making.

Dramatic differences are the rule at Pan

Innovation. Creativity. Flair. Poignancy. All of these words apply in equal measure to Pan, where Greek / Mediterranean cuisine takes on a delightfully proprietary dimension.

Cited as "one of the city's best" Greek restaurants by Toronto Life magazine, Pan keeps its customers coming back by delivering consistently superb quality across an ever-evolving array of dishes that are deliciously different — sometimes subtly, often dramatically — from any other versions out there.

Pan's updated menu is a case in point. While retaining signature dishes like the Char-Grilled Loin of Lamb with fig and orange glaze and the Santorini chicken due to ongoing demand, it features a number of new, absolute must-try offerings. The Pan Seared Grouper is delicacy incarnate, with its thin strip of salmon, in a white wine cream reduction wrapped around asparagus and served with new mini potatoes and cherry tomatoes.

Topping the heartiness scale, without sacrificing refinement, is a Black Angus New York striploin served with garlic mash and grilled portobello mushrooms, finished with Madagascar peppercorns in a brandy-beef reduction sauce. And just when you think you've tasted the be-all and the end-all in seafood pasta, Pan raises the bar another notch with its Linguini with shrimp, calamari, mussels and sea bass in a heavenly basil tomato sauce.

The dips — one standard by which all Greek restaurants can be measured and compared — still lead the Danforth parade in flavour and presentation.

Meeting elevated expectations isn't just a responsibility, it's fun, says owner Peter Kyriacou. "Our customers expect each meal to be better than the last; we wouldn't have it any other way." Peter, wife Maria and daughter Stella are a welcoming presence. Though Pan caters to an international clientele liberally sprinkled with movie stars and other show business personalities, this is one celebrity restaurant that always treats each customer with the same warmth and personal attention.

Recently renovated, Pan now sports a shiny new hardwood floor and a brighter, uptempo colour scheme, though the feel is still warm and artsy-vibrant. The stage is always set for a gala performance, and night in, night out, Pan rewards with an elevating dining experience.

Sun Valley obsessed with quality

Think you're good at spotting imperfections in fruit and vegetables? Think again. At Sun Valley Fine Foods, you may need a magnifying glass. In row on bountiful row, the produce at this sparkling fine food emporium comes as close to perfection as you'll ever find. Sun Valley shops the world over for the best that nature has to offer. One example: fresh herbs are flown in weekly from Israel.

Sun Valley brims with culinary delights in every nook and cranny. You'll find breads from Ace Bakery and Future Bakery, among others; cakes and pastries from Dufflet, La Rocca and Pauline's; and the finest cookies, crackers and jams money can buy. If it's delectable, it's here: caviar from The Caviar House, gourmet chocolates galore (dozens of famous brands including Lindt, Côte D'Or, and Guylian), and Toronto's finest selection of gourmet gift baskets.

Sun Valley's "designer collection" of fine spreadables, sauces and dressings includes a host of famous labels from around the world, as well as its own house brand of jams, sauces and dressings bottled for it by an award-winning supplier. Olive oil? Exotic brands too numerous to mention, including one exclusive to Sun Valley that was ranked #1 among all oils tested in a major media poll. New prepared foods are constantly being introduced, and Sun Valley's selection of Kosher products continues to expand.

Open to 9 p.m. 7 days • Delivery available

If you're entertaining but don't feel like cooking, the party trays for which Sun Valley is famous are a phone call away, and their Deli dips and cold cuts are outstanding.

One extremely pleasant surprise at Sun Valley is price. You'd expect to pay a premium for the exquisite quality they offer, but you don't. "Value is part of our tradition," says partner Spiro Aravantinos. "We cannot and will not overcharge."

For the barbecue, Sun Valley's hand-cut shish kebabs are distinctively superior to the cookie-cutter variety you'll find in many supermarkets. They are typical of Sun Valley's obsession with quality; as an in-store sign proudly proclaims, they contain NO MSG. WE NEVER USE IT AND WE NEVER WILL.

Spiro thrives on the long hours that are part and parcel of the food business. "It's a labour of love," he smiles — and one that's rewarded daily. "When customers take our food home, in a sense they're taking us home."

GREEKTOWN ON THE DANFORTH

Taste the world at the 9th annual Krinos Foods Taste of the Danforth Friday Aug. 9 — Sunday Aug. 11

GreekTown invites you to Dinner! GreekTown is throwing a party and you're invited! The 9th Annual Krinos Taste of the Danforth will take place Friday August 9 to Sunday August 11. The festivities kick off at 6 p.m. on the Friday and continue to midnight, resume from noon to midnight on the Saturday and run from noon to 8 p.m. on the Sunday.

A taste experience . . . and a musical experience with free concerts

Says Bill Vomvolakis, Chair of the Krinos Taste of the Danforth Committee, "It's an amazing event. The Danforth is closed, the hundred restaurants put their tasting tables out on the sidewalk and the people come. Of course there is lots of Greek food, but there is an increasing number of restaurants representing other cultures: Thai, Chinese, Japanese, Cuban, Indian, and others. GreekTown has become a reflection of Toronto's multiculturalism."

The Tastes range in cost from $1 to $5 and are offered by the restaurants of the Danforth.

Great Greek music and amazing Greek dancers

And of course, what dining experience is complete without music? The Krinos Taste of the Danforth offers a musical experience as well as a taste experience. Performing on the Main Stage this year are 54*40 on Friday night, Jim Cuddy on Saturday night and The Backstabbers on Sunday evening. The concerts are all FREE. The Main Stage is located at Logan and Danforth; adjacent to it, you'll find the Labatt Beer Garden a welcome oasis when you need to "take a break".

Toronto Maple Leafs Breakaway Tour, Rock Climbing Walls, midway

And to extend your Greek cultural experience beyond cuisine, visit the ever-popular Greek Stage at Danforth and Pape. This stage is so popular, we recommend you come early to hear great Greek music and watch the amazing performances of the Greek dancers. The Boutari and Mythos Garden complements the wonderful Greek cuisine and culture.

To support the international cuisine now found in GreekTown, visit the International Stage where the VISA Fashion Show is featured. The International Stage offers music from around the world and also highlights the fashions found on the Danforth.

Proceeds to Toronto East General Hospital

Bring the children! We have the Toronto Maple Leafs Breakaway Tour, Rock Climbing Walls and the very popular midway!

Don't forget that when you visit the Krinos Taste of the Danforth, you are supporting the Toronto East General Hospital. To date the Hospital has received almost $500,000 to support the new Maternal and Child Care Wing.

Mark August 9-11, 2002 on your calendar. Don't eat before you come! And enjoy the 9th Annual Krinos Taste of the Danforth. Opa!

GREEKTOWN ON THE DANFORTH

The Blue Shoe Box a perfect fit for Danforth

That's the store we're talking about; we haven't even slipped on a shoe yet!

Fortuitously, the men's shoes offered here are every bit the aesthetic equal of the shop that sells them. Recognizing a niche for upscale men's shoes in GreekTown, proprietor Eliséo (Tony) Staffiere has filled it admirably with The Blue Shoe Box — so named because the shoes of his own design come in an elegant navy box.

The store occupies a small space, but what Staffiere and design consultant Maria Ramirez-Perri have done with it is magical. The elongated, pencil-thin premises — conceivably a metaphor for a long, slender foot — have an architectural history. The intricately moulded 70-year-old copper ceiling still shows splendidly through its fresh coat of white paint. Cappuccino-coloured spaccoed walls, exposed red brick and butterscotch-toned oak shelving frame a gleaming strip hardwood floor.

The Blue Shoe Box
499 Danforth Ave. 416-289-6727

Staffiere's father and grandfather were both shoemakers in their native Italy, and he's carried on the family tradition by designing his own line of custom men's shoes, Eliséo Staffiere, available only at The Blue Shoe Box. Made in Italy to his exacting specifications, they feature double leather soles, double stitching, and the finest quality leather uppers. As the manufacturer, Staffiere is able to offer these shoes — which equal or surpass many leading designer names in quality and styling — at significantly less than their real worth. He's also able to have them custom designed for clients with special needs, and offer the kind of personal service and expert fitting that many larger stores don't.

In addition to Eliséo Staffiere, The Blue Shoe Box carries fine lines like Kenneth Cole, Mephisto, and Ecco. A hot new Italian sport/casual line, Geox, features perforated soles for the ultimate in comfort and breathability, and is available for both women and men.

It's always exciting to discover a new shop that's beautiful, functional, and altogether different from any other in its category. The Blue Shoe Box is that kind of store.

Christina's effuses summery spirit

Always delightful, the Danforth really comes to full flower in summer; and nowhere is that summery spirit better exemplified than at the new, updated Christina's.

Thanks to extensive renovations undertaken by new owners Bill and Kathy Vomvolakis, Christina's exudes a newfound brightness and joie-de-vivre. Outside, its golden frontage sports elegant wrought-iron signage, and its patio is once again THE summer spot to eat, greet, see and be seen — an epicentre of Danforth activity. Inside, earth tones, buttercup yellow and turquoise form a soothing backdrop for newly-restored Greek etchings.

Christina's
On The Danforth
492 Danforth at Logan
416-463-4418
www.christinas.info

Christina's is ideally suited for private functions. Indoors, a cozy, slightly elevated dining area at rear provides intimacy; outdoors, the patio is always a hot ticket for open-air celebrations.

Most notably, however, Christina's new, authentically Greek menu reaffirms its position as a Danforth dining leader. In addition to the wonderful mainstream Greek fare you'd expect, there are many unique surprises you wouldn't expect. To cite but one example, the Kolokithokeftedes — minced, mildly spiced zucchini patties with potato, onion and parsley, gently pan-fried to golden crispness — are the perfect complement to any meal. THIS is what GreekTown is all about. The assorted dip platters (Pikilia Mezedakia, cold; Christina's Pikilia, hot & cold) are both teeming and delicious. The Seafood Souvlaki features large, marinated chunks of calamari, shrimps and scallops, grilled to perfection. The Greek Island Seafood Soup is heart-warmingly flavourful, the Grilled Seafood Salad on organic baby greens in orange thyme vinaigrette, piquant and precise.

The portions are extremely generous, the prices very reasonable, the wine selection greatly expanded. What better way to enjoy Christina's patio than by sipping on a glass of cool white wine?

Fresh fish and seafood lovers will be particularly pleased with Christina's new direction. Maritime innovations abound throughout the menu, from appetizers to salad to soup. There's even a seafood souvlaki! Traditional items also prove gratifying. The leg of lamb, succulently stuffed with spinach, sautéed onion, pepper and fresh herbs, is noteworthy, as is the vegetarian moussaka — elegantly and precisely layered.

Christina's. It's the perfect place to rekindle your love affair with the Danforth.

Kalyvia redefines "homemade"

Used in conjunction with restaurant food, the term "homemade" might seem contradictory; in the case of Kalyvia, however, it definitely rings true.

Mike and Peter Tsafatinos, who hail from the Greek town of Kalyvia, a few miles from Sparta, have seen their culinary efforts rewarded by an unerring reputation for authentic, "homemade" Greek cuisine at the Danforth's most approachable prices. This is no small achievement, considering that literally everything on the menu is prepared from scratch fresh daily.

KALYVIA
420 DANFORTH AVE.

Kalyvia's lofty standards for quality and freshness have earned it a four-star rating from Toronto by Night Journal, and a loyal clientele that has ushered Kalyvia into its second decade of success.

Under the watchful eye of Jim Tsafatinos (Mike's son) and a host of other family members, each and every dish emerges from the kitchen brimming with homemade taste. As befits a "homemade" meal, portions are gargantuan — worthy of any doting mother. The combination platters, priced from $26.95, offer a staggering variety of Greek specialties, yet each item is prepared with individual attention and care. The dips are particularly zesty; any three can be ordered for only $9.50. Highly recommended are the Melitzanosalata (eggplant), Skordalia (potato), and Taramosalata (red caviar).

The Mushrooms à la Kalyvia ($4.95) — sautéed in spices and brandy — is wonderfully decadent. And if you're partial to Spanakopitakia (spinach pies), you'll be able to taste the Kalyvia difference.

You won't find a better pizza anywhere in Toronto, due in large part to the dough, which is made fresh daily on the premises. Pizzas are available in five sizes, from individual to extra-large; the Greek style pizza, with its superb homemade sauce, is a logical choice, and rates a resounding 10 on the flavour scale.

The warm, peach-toned walls are adorned by Greek murals and original art. The ceramic-tiled dining room fronts a smaller, more intimate elevated dining area at rear with strip oak flooring.

Kalyvia is one of a very few places in Toronto where you can still enjoy the tastes and trappings of home in a family restaurant environment. It has "Mom" written all over it.

Traverso 2002: high style, modest pricing

Traverso, the eminently graceful knitwear collection from Athens, now has a sister collection (Sabbia) that's also making fashion waves.

Renowned in Greece for their elegance and quality construction, the Traverso and Sabbia lines are available in Toronto at 592 Danforth Avenue, across from Korry's. With its bleached oak floor, white-and-cream interior and antique trim, the shop provides a bright, sunny backdrop for these fetching designs.

Traverso features predominately natural, breathable fibres in many classic styles, yet even the simplest pieces often feature fanciful detailing that sets them apart from other popular knitwear lines. Sizes range from 4 to 14, and up to 16 for certain items. Summer colours include black on white, red, light blue and camel.

Traverso's appeal is enhanced by its transitional quality; warm enough for spring and fall, yet cool enough for summer, most garments carry effortlessly from season to season. Their timeless elegance also means they'll never go out of style, and "they wear magnificently," says owner Tracy Stamp. "We stand behind our product unconditionally."

Sabbia features a broader range of materials such as crisp, wrinkle-resistant European linens, cotton and lycra. It provides a carefree counterpoint to Traverso's classicism, but both collections are beautifully textured and priced far lower than what you'd expect to pay for this level of quality.

Moving into fall, there's a terrific selection of suits appropriate for the High Holidays.

So, to achieve the look and bearing of an Athenian beauty, you no longer need to traverse the Atlantic; just visit 592 Danforth and experience Traverso first-hand. Once you've run these wondrous fibres through your fingers, you'll want to make them a permanent part of your wardrobe.

Sharifian's hair, salon services a natural

He's a dead ringer for Antonio Banderas, has a killer smile, and will give you the haircut of your life.

If you're one of the many women who travel from all over Toronto and as far afield as New York City to enjoy the Sharifian treatment, we'll give you the benefit of the doubt: it's his cutting and styling skills you're after.

In a 20-year career featuring lengthy stints in London, Amsterdam and Tokyo, Ben Sharifian has become known for his innate ability to enhance a woman's inner beauty as few other stylists can. Explains wife and partner Susan, who handles the salon's business affairs, "many of our customers can't verbalize what they want in a cut and style. But once Ben is done, they say, "That's it! That's exactly what I wanted!" Adds Ben: "being a good listener is an important part of being a good stylist".

SHARIFIAN
Salon & Spa
676 Pape Ave. at Danforth
416•469•4247
www.sharifian.com

But chic hairstyling is only part of the Sharifian Salon story. On their immaculate, spacious premises — one of the Danforth's largest — they offer a full range of esthetic and spa services. There are five private rooms, each dedicated to a separate service: pedicure, waxing, facials, massage, and full shower facilities. The staff includes a certified acupuncturist and aromatherapist.

The open, expansive, airy salon is bathed in soft, soothing golden and amber tones, from the cream-coloured ceramic tile floor to the warm pine ceiling. Naturally-aged exposed red brick and leafy green plants complete the picture, sending a soft but distinct message: RELAX.

In keeping with the natural approach, Sharifian uses only the finest natural and organic products for your hair and body.

Sharifian's move from the Bay/Bloor area, where he was located for a number of years, means you're getting elite Yorkville hairstyling and spa services at a fraction of Yorkville prices. Either Sharifian's hairstyling skills or the salon services would warrant a visit in their own right; the opportunity to enjoy both under the same roof — with friendly personal service — is irresistible. "This area suits us better," says Ben Sharifian. "It's more laid back. It's about taking life slowly, one day at a time."

Taking one day at a time sounds good, and a visit to Sharifian is a step in that direction. But once you see what he does to your hair, you'll wish that day could last forever.

Big Carrot's commitment to organics & service repaid by customer loyalty

In a field with an ever-increasing number of players, The Big Carrot has maintained its leadership position by stocking its shelves with products that are as good for the environment as they are for you, and by providing a level of expertise and personal service unmatched in the industry. From humble beginnings in 1983, it has grown into metropolitan Toronto's largest Canadian-owned purveyor of products for healthy living.

Organic, GMO-free, Kosher products

Run as a worker owned co-op since its opening, The Big Carrot caters to a loyal clientele that embraces both its ethos and its products: minimally processed, organically grown, cruelty free, environmentally safe and, increasingly, GMO-free. As it happens, many of these products are also Kosher.

Anchoring the Carrot Common Mall with a laid-back, homespun atmosphere that its customers value as much as the products themselves, The Big Carrot is really three stores in one: a health food store and market, a wholistic dispensary, and — thanks to its latest expansion — an organic juice, coffee and sandwich bar.

Health-conscious customers seek out The Big Carrot for its extensive organic fruit and vegetable department (over 100 varieties at peak season) and its unmatched selection of organic bulk foods, dairy products, frozen foods, and packaged goods. Its extensive body care department boasts Canada's widest selection of personal care products for the entire family, including baby.

While most health food stores carry a few brands of a particular item, The Big Carrot often has half a dozen or more, and its well-versed staff is more than happy to help you decide which products will suit your dietary needs and your palate. If it's wheat-free — if it's dairy-free — if it's simply good for you, The Big Carrot has it.

For natural and organic pastas, breads, buns, bagels, flatbreads, cookies, muffins, and other wholesome nosherie, no other store — or bakery, for that matter — even comes close. There are literally dozens of choices here, many of them wheat-free, dairy-free, Kosher — or a combination thereof.

The Big Carrot has by far Toronto's largest selection of soy milks and other non-dairy beverages, both fresh and tetra pack.

Among many others, the Kosher products include Crofters Organic Premium Fruit Spreads from Ontario; tomato products from Utopia, also Ontario-grown; Seeds of Change salsas; Woodstock Organics Frozen Soups; Imagine Foods Tetra Pack Dairy-Free Soups (the ultimate in convenience); Nature's Path Organic Cereals; Organic Meadow Yogurts & Pressed Cheese; Jersey Farm Non-Dairy Soy Yogurt; cookies from Mrs. Denson's and Organica; Soy Delicious Non-Dairy Frozen Desserts; selected products from Eden Foods; and an immense variety of chips and other snack foods.

The Big Carrot carries a tremendous variety of healthy sweets, including Tropical Source chocolate bars. They're organic, Kosher, made in Israel, and available in several delicious flavours. Try the Hazelnut Espresso Crunch!

The Deli counter offers more than 50 mouthwatering selections, both hot and cold. From the Organic Lentil Daal to the Organic Couscous Salad, every item is a taste and visual treat. It also offers a selection of sinfully delicious desserts without the sin, since they're free of refined ingredients.

The Big Carrot's Wholistic Dispensary, located across the courtyard, constitutes a store in its own right. Among other Kosher products, it carries Omega Flax Seed Oil and selected Solgar Supplements.

Of Toronto's growing number of juice bars, The Big Carrot's is the only one that's 100% organic, giving you, in a quick pit stop, the optimum high-octane fuel. There are over 50 choices of juices, blender drinks, salubrious substances, shakes, and fair-trade organic coffees. Hot sellers include the Musician's Magic (apple, pear, kiwi, Ginkgo) and the Energy Elevator (carrot, spinach, raspberry, Ginseng). This isn't just juice, it's a meal replacement.

Among the sandwiches, try the Grilled Tempeh, lettuce, tomato, red onion & honey mustard mayo — or design your own from a compelling variety of organic ingredients. Fresh, delicious and wholesome — just as Nature intended.

The events during a recent power outage exemplify the Big Carrot experience. Rather than becoming impatient and gnashing their teeth, customers simply relaxed, chatted, and munched on organic cookies cheerily dispensed by a staff member. If you want the word "stress" to disappear from your vocabulary — at least temporarily — shop here.

Through its continuing expansion, The Big Carrot has retained the humility and friendliness of its early years. This is a store that's down to earth in every possible sense, and a real pleasure to visit.

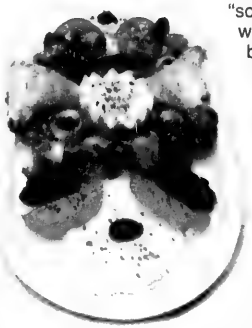
Astoria, Imago the hear

Astoria

390 Danforth Ave. at Chester Subway. • 416-463-2838
www.astoriashishkebob.com

Astoria. The mere mention of the name conjures up images of flaming souvlakis, mountainous portions that would make any bubie proud, and the kind of warm hospitality that is unmistakably Greek. This isn't just a restaurant, it's an icon.

Think "GreekTown", in fact, and you're liable to think "Astoria." For 28 years, this venerable "institution of higher dining" has come to symbolize the culinary qualities GreekTown is known for: great food, great quality, and great value. Most of Astoria's original customers are still regulars, and wouldn't dream of going anywhere else.



Astoria's now-famous "souvlaki window", always a beehive of activity, is an indelible image of Danforth life. And what souvlaki! Judged "Best of the City" by Toronto Life and "Best of Toronto" by Now Magazine, Astoria's souvlaki helped make it a multiple winner of the Toronto Sun's Readers' Choice Award as Toronto's favourite Greek restaurant.

Other jewels on the menu include hearty moussaka, exquisite broiled sea bass and salmon steaks – and Greek appetizers like grilled kalamari and grilled octopus, if you can keep your souvlaki craving at bay long enough to sample them.

Location and atmosphere are other Astoria assets. For a big restaurant, it's remarkably cozy, due to its corner location, dual outdoor patios (GreekTown's largest), and quiet, richly appointed interior.

Heading eastbound on Bloor, you know you're on the Danforth once you hit Broadview; but you don't really feel it until Astoria's white facade with its pale blue trim leaps joyously into view, bidding you "Welcome to GreekTown" in words that the food lover in you understands so well.

Across the street and just east of Astoria, another GreekTown player has emerged that promises to define multicultural entertainment the way Astoria has defined Greek dining:

If Astoria is the heart of GreekTown, then Imago is fast becoming its soul. Imago — pronounced ee-máh-go, and Latin for "an idealized mental image of another person or the self", is easy to fall for. Exuding joie-de-vivre, it's a giant collage of Greek imagery, featuring a liberal sprinkling of artifacts, patterns and shapes, a dash of intrigue, a pinch of kitsch, and a truckload of chutzpah, all done up in a glorious palette of rich pastels. Circles, ellipses and Greek hieroglyphics abound; there's not a right angle in the place. "We Greeks don't think straight," says owner Chris Skiouris (same family as the Astoria Skiouris-es), "but we do know how to party."

The ochre facade and entranceway is a stunning work of art in its own right: a delightful montage of bouzoukis, folk dancers, urns, goblets, and the Greek key that also shows up the railings, the tabletops, the front of the long elliptical bar, even the wrought-iron bases of some of the bar stools.

The entranceway segues into a purple and plum-toned interior, not unlike t and soul of Greektown

the tropical beverages that are a hot item here.

Says Chris, "The Danforth has always been known as the place for Greek food and hospitality. But dining is only part of the Greek experience. Toronto has never had a club that captured the essence of Greek nightlife but still had the kind of universal appeal that would make it inviting to non-Greeks. Now it does."

How does Imago cater to the general population without watering down its Greek content? By offering a variety of entertainment that strictly Greek clubs don't:

- Hot Salsa Wednesday: Salsa dance lessons from 8:30 to 9:30 p.m., live Salsa band from 9:30 p.m.
- Sizmos (Earthquake) Friday: Live 5 piece Greek youth bands play the latest dance music, plus live DJ.
- Greek Island Saturday: A night to remember, as you would experience on an island in Greece.
- Rembetiko Sunday: Imago moves into a mellower, more nostalgic mode with beautiful bouzouki music, a live 5 piece band, and a dress code.

Clearly, Imago has something for everyone. If you have an affinity for Israeli folk music, the Sunday Greek variety is markedly similar, but Imago's vibrance will appeal to anyone with a zest for living.

There are many fine patios on the Danforth, but Imago's split-level patio configuration is unique: air-conditioned outdoor seating below, street-level seating above. The interplay of indoor and outdoor environments merely adds to the fun.

With ambience to burn, it's not surprising that Imago has become a hot spot for film industry wrap parties and other gala events.

Time was, your visit to GreekTown wasn't official until you'd dined at Astoria. Now, says Chris, it isn't official until you've danced at Imago. For the true Greek experience, you simply have to do both — preferably in the same evening, he says.

Astoria and Imago aren't identical twins, but they are kindred spirits: one the fresser, the other the partier, and when they meet, it's beautiful.

Astoria and Imago have long been active in supporting a variety of charities, so their involvement in the upcoming Taste of the Danforth is a natural, says Chris. "It's an opportunity for everyone to eat, drink and be merry and support wonderful charities at the same time. How's that for a win-win scenario?"

GreekTown, anyone?

Computerized services aid investors

The age-old advice that you shouldn't put all your eggs in one basket continues to ring true when it comes to successful investing. In fact, diversification — or the way a portfolio is allocated among investment types — is more important than the specific stocks, bonds or mutual funds selected.

That's why Jonathan Sceeles of the investment firm Edward Jones offers a computer service called Portfolio Analysis. "Despite the proven success of diversified investment strategies, many investors own only one or two types of securities," says Sceeles. "Portfolio Analysis helps ensure that they're adequately diversified, and it enables them to see, at a glance, whether their current investments are on track to meet their long-term goals."

Portfolio Analysis lists and categorizes securities in an orderly way and has the ability to include income sources other than investments.

The program also provides a month-by-month summary of the income that investors can expect to receive from their investments, as well as simple graphs comparing their current investment strategy to the firm's recommended allocations.

"The comprehensive record of the client's financial situation provided by this service also can be helpful in record-keeping, particularly at tax time," notes Sceeles.

"Our firm is always looking for ways to maximize available technology, and this service is an example of that," says Sceeles. "The computer program, which is free of charge, enhances the advice I give my clients, helping us make the most of their investments."

Ampeli knows only one way: the right way

There's no substitute for freshness. In three short years, Ampeli has drawn the kind of rave reviews restaurants covet. Partners Tony Nina and Paul Vouzas attribute their success to a simple formula: use the freshest, highest-quality ingredients, lightly seasoned and prepared simply. Everything's cooked to order, meaning you have to wait a little longer for your meal to arrive; but the wait is more than worth it.

Meat and fish are always fresh, never frozen, and Ampeli has become renowned for both. You simply can't find better rack of lamb or Ontario lamb chops anywhere. The fresh fish is so popular customers usually specify, when making reservations, which type of fish they want. Red snapper, porgy, codfish, smelts, whiting — if it's just been caught, you'll find it on Ampeli's table the same day.

For Nina and Vouzas this means more legwork, combing the market for the freshest catch of the day. "This isn't an option," says Nina. "It's an obligation to our customers."

Head chef Elias Cripouris has 35 years of experience in Greek cuisine, and it shows.

Warm ciabatta bread accompanies every meal with a side of olive oil and balsamic vinegar. Fresh pasta is hand-made on the premises, and all sauces are à la minute.

Ampeli's distinctive red brick exterior and huge patios, complete with bright flowers, are a welcome sight for anyone seeking Greek and Mediterranean cuisine as it's meant to taste.

> "... Only at Ampeli did we meet moist, tender, roast Ontario lamb. Ditto the moussaka experience .... at Ampeli the moussaka was marvellously fragrant, full of rich flavours. Roasted mashed eggplant dip is zinged with fresh mint, and marinated octopus is tender with a lovely vinegar bite. Meaty little quails have been marinated for tenderness and are cooked just so, and the grilled fresh porgy is a paragon of Piscean virtue, with especially crisp skin."

Eighth wonder of the fashion world

If your fashion shopping brings you to Eight, you've definitely arrived. The fashions are hot, the music is hip, the service warm and personal. One question: Why "Eight"?

Don't probe too deeply. Remember, as a child, repeatedly scribbling your favourite number? Eight was owner Karin Kassabian's.

While the naiveté of childhood has been replaced by the moxy of 14 years in the fashion business, Eight still wears the badge of K's youthful enthusiasm.

Using a formula of 20 parts Queen Street urban chic, 40 parts Bloor Street style and 100 parts fashion flair — at très friendly prices — Eight flat-out rocks.

K, who learned her trade in one of Canada's largest fashion chains, knew "from day one" that she would someday own her own store. Now that her vision of that store has materialized at Danforth and Logan, fashion shoppers city-wide are feeling its vibe.

Part of Eight's special energy emanates from K herself, whose expertise and unassuming approach resonates with customers. "We operate on a 100 percent comfort zone here, not 99 percent," she says.

This comfort level extends to fitting, where K's keen eyes ensure that you'll look great in whatever garment you try on — or it won't leave the shop with you.

Eight caters equally to men and women of almost all ages. "My customers range from 16 to 66," says K, whose target market is "anyone who wants to look good and feel good".

Though Eight carries loads of hip denim for both women and men, it's much more than a jeans store. From mainstream styles to beyond-the-edge, Eight carries the later-than-latest in casual clothing from Italy, Amsterdam and other European fashion hotbeds. Because Kassabian's buying is intensely personal — "I wear what I sell" — you won't find Eight's pieces all over town. This suits K and her clientele just fine. "My taste may take me out on a limb, but lots of people have climbed onto that limb with me."

Obviously, Kassabian feeds off customer satisfaction. "I want you to leave smiling," she grins.

We are. Must have been something we eight.

GREEKTOWN ON THE DANFORTH

Thuna Herbals' past a beacon for future

It's a delightful anachronism reminiscent of an old English apothecary shop. Fifteen hundred glass jars, each filled with a different herb or root, stacked high in orderly rows. The original creaking hardwood floor. And a proprietor who's all about knowledge and caring.

Established in 1888 (how's that for history?), this family business is now run by Evelyn Dorfman, the granddaughter of founder Dr. Max Harriman Thuna, and a staff of qualified herbalists on the original turn-of-the-century premises at 298 Danforth Avenue.

Over the years, the Thuna family has seen the use of herbal remedies — once the de facto method of treatment for most medical problems — lose ground to the synthetic drugs that have flooded the marketplace.

More recently, however, the pendulum has slowly but surely begun to swing back, as more and more people seek alternatives to mainstream medicine. Thuna's doesn't diagnose problems presented to them; rather, they advise customers seeking a diagnosis to obtain it from their medical practitioners. Some come with the blessing of their GP, but many are referred by naturopathic practitioners. Typically, clients come in on their own initiative.

Saul Pasen helped pioneer herbalism in Canada

THUNA HERBALS

Drawing on their schooling, Dorfman and staff choose from some 2,000 herbs, berries, roots, and leaves the precise combination most likely to alleviate an ailment presented to them. To cite but one example, a formula for bladder infection, or even interstitial cystitis, might include uva-ursi leaves, buchu leaves, parsley leaves, marshmallow root, corn silk, and goldenseal leaves.

Dr. Thuna and his children, including son-in-law Saul Pasen, pictured above, helped pioneer herbalism in Canada.

The current premises stand as a rich reminder of Canadian history. Even if you have only a passing interest in herbalism, you owe it to yourself to visit this Toronto landmark. And who knows — by asking a few questions, you might become further enlightened on this ancient practice.

Ici Paris: 27-year legacy of caring

Over the past three decades, Ici Paris has been at the forefront of scientific advances in natural skin care therapies.

If you're with child, then WITH CHILD is with you

You're expecting. Ideally, you'd like to find everything you need at a prenatal store that treats your child-to-be as if it was their child.

Enter With Child. Now in its eighth year as a one-stop shop for expectant mothers, this is one pre/postnatal store that goes the extra mile for its customers. An ultraconvenient location at the corner of Pape and Danforth — steps away from the Pape subway and a huge municipal parking lot — makes it doubly attractive.

With an emphasis on breast feeding, cloth diapering and attachment parenting, With Child carries a wide range of quality products. They're big on cloth diapers, from flat to fitted, and organic bedding. Brand names include Lunar Eclipse, Avent, Blissful Babes, Baby Trekker heart-to-heart carriers, and Bravado nursing bras. A huge selection of books is also available. In the fall, With Child plans to introduce a variety of high-quality European strollers.

More than the products, however, it's the warm, laid-back personal service that distinguishes With Child from other prenatal stores, says manager Tina Martins. With Child's mandate is to "ease the transition from pregnancy to motherhood. Most of us [herself and her associates] are parents ourselves, so we speak your language."

With Child has everything you need for your baby, but one thing you won't find here is pressure. "Motherhood carries enough of that already, without adding to it", winks Martins. So laid-back is the approach, she explains, that mothers often come in, breast feed and leave, without feeling obliged to shop.

While you're there, of course, Martins and her staff are only too happy to offer expert advice on any topic relating to childbirth. This kind of one-on-one support is always valuable, especially if you're a first-time mother. Starting in September, With Child will also offer interactive parenting programmes and mothering groups.

With Child's relationship with their customers carries through the pregnancy to the delivery and well beyond. They can arrange a Medela breast pump rental after your discharge. Their active interest in the ongoing welfare of your child comes as close to surrogate motherhood as you could possibly want.

If you're with child, then With Child is with you — every step of the way.

Octavia's fifth year of first-rate cuisine

When a restaurant defies convention and succeeds, it's news. When it continues to build on its early success well into its fifth year, it's headlines.

Who better to introduce a bold new concept than an old pro? With his legendary Memories gone but not forgotten, Tom Konis has shown, with son John and partner Tom Athanasopoulos, that there's always room for a new player when that player brings something new to the table.

Octavia resists the labels of Mediterranean and Continental, yet its menu features elements of both, and ripples with master strokes. It's much easier to savour the Poppyseed Grilled Salmon in a Lemon Butter Garlic Reduction than to define it. Peccorina Pizza with roasted red peppers, onions, wild mushrooms, soft ripened goat cheese and lamb rosemary sausage can't be categorized; it's simply splendid pizza.

Steak lovers take note: Octavia doesn't bill itself as a steak house, but its New York U.S. prime sets a standard that steak houses might well aspire to. Grilled to perfection and served in a Brandy Peppercorn sauce, it ranks below its competitors in only one respect: price.

After dinner, Octavia puts on its lounge hat and serves up some of Toronto's finest martinis. Dessert martinis are a specialty; among others, the Espresso Martini will put an exclamation point on your evening. And, unlike some establishments which merely encourage you to relax after dinner, Octavia's built for relaxation. Its intimate, leather-upholstered semicircular booths evoke a Roaring Twenties elegance, while the signature serpentine bar is pure 21st century.

Since opening, in fact, Octavia has continually updated its decor to ensure that dining pleasure and visual pleasure go hand in hand. In the current colour scheme, chocolate and mocha tones soothe and soften the mood. It's a uniquely modern dining environment favoured by those with avant-garde tastes.

OCTAVIA

menupalace.com/octavia

Make no mistake about it, though: the spirit of old-fashioned personal service is ever-present. The singular focus of the Octavia team is to ensure that both your meal and your visit are memorable, and no efforts are spared towards that end.

Increased popularity sometimes makes it more difficult to continue dealing with customers one on one. Thankfully, Octavia hasn't grown too quickly to forget where it came from.

Memorable cuisine, memorable service: both have "Tom Konis" written all over them.

GREEKTOWN ON THE DANFORTH

Ouzeri thrives on fresh approach

Marrying European fine dining with Greek cuisine, Ouzeri has much to offer Danforth-goers.

Brothers Chris and Alex Trahiotis (whose father Jim was executive chef and partner at Burlington's famed Lord Nelson Restaurant) offer a menu focused on quality, not volume. "We prefer fifty superb selections to a hundred good ones," says Alex. "And freshness is paramount."

OUZERI

The wide variety of Greek appetizers bear out this claim, as do a number of intriguing entrées. Signature dishes include the wonderfully garnished and baked Oysters Ouzeri; Lamb Rosemary Pie; and Breaded Chicken with Wine Mushroom or Lemon Butter Sauce.

Fresh fish is available daily, and may feature Red Snapper, Sea Bass, Tuna, or whatever catch happens to be freshest on the day you visit.

Accompany these delectables with a fine wine from Ouzeri's extensive international list and you have all the ingredients of a culinary bonanza.

Ouzeri is a cheery, colourful, festive place with three dining levels and a patio that is among the Danforth's largest and liveliest. The service is friendly and extremely thorough, with ample wait staff to keep pace with your needs. The dining environment is immaculate, the cuisine impeccable. In short, Ouzeri is everything you could possibly want in a Greek restaurant.

Early or late, 521 goes down smoothly

Too often in our fast-paced lives, we find ourselves racing to and from dinner. 521 Café & Bar has taken a stand against that mindset by encouraging dinner-goers to warm up to dinner, or wind down after it, with a relaxing beverage.

Just because it entices you to stop and smell the roses, however, doesn't mean 521 is slow-paced. It's a high-energy environment, always busy and abuzz with animated conversation. A wide range of international music is paced according to the clientele's energy level and mood.

CAFE BAR

This L-shaped gem occupies one of the Danforth's choicest corner locations, at Fenwick just west of Carlaw. Two separate patios — the smaller in front, the larger, more private one at rear — usher you into 521's boldly elegant interior. Original canvases of charcoal and burnt orange adorn the steel-gray walls. Slate-gray leather bench seating with polished oak backing spans the café's entire length, facing the mirrored bar.

First-rate scotches, martinis and speciality mixed beverages are 521's stock in trade. In particular, the 3 oz. martinis put to shame those of many high-profile downtown haunts. The specialty coffees and frappés are also first rate. Spanish coffee, Irish coffee, Monte Cristo — 521 delivers all with full strength and flavour.

Though it's a café first and foremost, 521 also offers delicious light meals, and prices across the board are eminently reasonable. For example, you can enjoy a lovely mixed garden salad with a hot pressed grilled sandwich for only $6.75. Plentiful cheese platters served with fruit or meat and grilled waffles are also specialties, and there's a variety of fresh desserts.

Brothers Frank and Lambros have been active in Danforth restaurants for most of their adult lives. In 521 they've succeeded in creating an environment distinctively different from any other on the Danforth. It's a smoking establishment with bar status, meaning you'll have to be 19 or over to enjoy it — but once you've reached that grand old age, you'll find that 521 was well worth waiting for.

So if this finds you heading down to the Danforth for dinner, why not budget another hour or two and turn a relaxing dinner into a very relaxing evening?

Every meal a special occasion at the Palace

At The Palace, every meal is a special occasion. From the moment you enter, you're treated like royalty — a feeling that's confirmed and enhanced with each and every bite.

A quick perusal of The Palace's menu reveals a selection of royal fare unmatched on the Danforth. The appetizers alone provide more choice than some entire menus, and they stand alone in terms of freshness, preparation and authenticity.

Among the hot appetizers, the Hot Mezze Platter (Kalamari, Grilled Octopus, Loukaniko, and Bifteki) is a meal in itself; among the cold, try the Cold Mezze Platter (Tzatziki, Taramosalata, Melitzanosalata, Kalamata Olives and pickled beets with pita).

If you can ever tear yourself away from the appetizers, the Avgolemono soup, a chicken & rice broth finished with gently whipped egg & lemon juice, is delicately prepared, the Greek salad crisp and lavishly portioned.

Rack of lamb and moussaka are two prized specialties of the house; you'll be hard-pressed to find their equal. The Lamb Kleftiko also deserves special mention; the combination of lamb, feta cheese, sweet bell peppers, onions and mushrooms is simply divine inside its phyllo pastry envelope.

THE PALACE RESTAURANT
416-462-1166

The Palace is also highly reputed for its fresh fish; try the Grilled Swordfish Steak with lemon and herbs, the Whole Broiled Sea Bass, or the Atlantic Salmon Steak. Whatever your preference, you'll find it here, prepared to the absolute maximum of its flavour. It's easy to see why The Palace is the favourite spot for discriminating fish lovers.

As befits a Palace, there's a private Party room for up to 100 people. Located on the upper level, it's ideal for birthday parties, Bar/Bat Mitzvah parties, or any event requiring the kind of ambience a banquet hall simply can't provide.

The management and staff go to great lengths to ensure your comfort and satisfaction. A visit to this culinary kingdom is pure pleasure; nobody does Greek like The Palace.

GREEKTOWN ON THE DANFORTH

Pantheon's popularity prompts major expansion

Of all the restaurants in GreekTown, Pantheon's decor is perhaps the most inviting. The creamy white tile floor etched with gold is soothing, yet refined; the walls, alive with colourful murals, are capped with finely etched wooden trim; the tables, bedecked with crisp linens in white and gold, are flanked by real wooden chairs.

Now, thanks to a major expansion, Pantheon has doubled in size while retaining its charm, intimacy and — most important — its culinary excellence. The "west wing", with rust-coloured tile and working fireplace, merely means there's much more of Pantheon to love.

Though its mainstream Greek cuisine compares favourably with that of other Danforth restaurants, fresh fish is what keeps Pantheon's loyal following coming back in droves. Whole sea bass, striped bass, red and white snapper, orange roughy, black porgy, salmon, red mullet, sea smelts — the variety is incredible, the preparation impeccable. As one major daily noted, "Above all, small fish imported from Greece, such as anchovies and baby sardines . . . demand repeat visits. [This lovely fish] is what sets Pantheon apart from most Toronto Greek restaurants."

Chef Nick Paroussis — who, with partner John Troupis, is responsible for maintaining these lofty standards — clearly understands the best way to bring out the intrinsic flavour of fresh fish is to treat it delicately, a practise that also extends to the fresh Ontario lamb chops, which can be enjoyed on their own or as part of a substantial mixed grill.

"... a winning charm ..."
"... fresh fish, care with good products and little razzmatazz nudges Pantheon ahead of most competitors ..."

Mouthwatering home-made desserts provide a fitting conclusion to your meal. In addition to the traditional baklava, you'll find Pantheon's walnut cake particularly enticing, and its honey cake will no doubt give rise to endless comparisons with you-know-who's.

You'd expect to pay a premium for such superb cuisine, but Pantheon's prices are actually below average for the Danforth. When you combine this with the aforementioned ambience, you're talking exceptional value for GreekTown.

Demetre's home-made ice cream irresistible

You're strolling the Danforth, minding your own business. Suddenly, you're being served a "Life Sentence" Belgian waffle with chocolate chip ripple ice cream, topped with bananas, fudge brownie, fudge and peanuts.

You're now just another inmate "doing time" at Caffé Demetre — swallowed up by a vortex of irresistible cones, sundaes, splits, gourmet coffees, cakes, crêpes and waffles, pies, flans — and the best ice cream you ever tasted.

Relax; it's a crime so common that the dessert emporium sells "over 2000 litres of ice cream a week" in peak season, according to partners Themy and Alex. The fact that it's home-made the old fashioned way (no additives, no preservatives) reduces somewhat the guilt of this unbelievably pleasurable indulgence. Demetre's is one of the very few places you'll find this "Real McCoy", and ice cream connoisseurs from all over Toronto seek it out. Its specialty cakes — for birthdays, Bar Mitzvahs, and other occasions — are similarly coveted.

You've served your life sentence, but there's no rest for the wicked. It's time for a "Sweetcar Named Devour" crêpe, with cocoa-chocolate ice cream topped with fresh strawberries and fudge. Wash it down with a cappuccino, espresso, frappé, steamer, or freshly brewed coffee (40 varieties in all).

Here's the real scoop:
We do not serve store-bought ice cream. We make our own gourmet ice cream — right here! Our Super Premium iced Creams are made fresh daily on the premises using 17% cream and the best quality ingredients blended with our original Caffé Demetre recipes. Because we make it fresh here, the ice cream is not exposed to heat shock. That's why it's so creamy and so good. ENJOY!

What a place to pop the big question! Sweeten up your prey with a "Romancing The Cone" Banana Split (white chocolate, cocoa-chocolate ice cream and praline hazelnut ice cream smothered with fudge toppings, capped with a cone). And get the ring ready.

Now that (s)he's said yes, celebrate with an Aristo-crème dark chocolate truffle sundae (two scoops of cocoa-chocolate ice cream rolled in chocolate curls, served on a bed of fudge with chocolate chunks and sprinkled with Dutch cocoa powder).

Now that you've enjoyed the main course, it's time for dessert . . .

BBI a telecommunications leader

With almost every adult now using some type of electronic device, the dealership you buy that device from takes on added importance.

Now entering its 9th year, BBI has established a reputation for expertise and reliability not only in GreekTown, but citywide. As one of Ontario's fastest growing Bell Mobility dealerships, its operations include the retail sale of telecommunications products and services, the development of telecommunications solutions (data solutions, mobile office), and involvement in community and corporate events such as Taste of the Danforth, of which it is a founding sponsor. Savvy consumers and corporations alike seek out BBI for their knowledge and reliability.

Unlike many dealers who are cell phone vendors and little more, BBI is a complete mobile solutions and telecommunications centre. Sotiris Buseas and his staff are thoroughly versed in their products they sell, and will take the time to explain all the features of the device you purchase.

BBI's history of involvement in community events like the Taste of The Danforth is only natural, says Buseas. "The Taste is about culture, and part of culture is communications. We like to think we can help people get their messages across clearly — in English, Greek, Hebrew, or any other language."

Now, if he can only ensure that the parental advice dispensed over these devices will actually get followed . . .

For convivial meals, visit Mezes.

A mezes, as you may know, is a tasty Greek dish served as an appetizer. Together, several mezedes make a hearty meal.

Usually, each guest orders one or two, then everyone shares. This practise is common to many other cultures; to cite but two, Latin American tapas and Oriental Dim Sum attest to the wide appeal of this dining style.

"It makes for a convivial meal," says Mezes proprietor Sue Zindros. "It stimulates conversation, sharing good feelings as well as food; and it encourages people to try new things."

Suppose someone suggests that you sample a new kind of seafood. Never having tried it, you might hesitate to order it as an entrée, but you'd be more than willing to share it with friends or family. If each person in your party orders a different mezes, you'll have an incredible variety of tastes and textures to sample and enjoy. The next time you visit, you can make a point of ordering the mezedes you liked as entrées.

Hungry diners, in Sue's experience, tend to order familiar things, or "comfort food". Mezes encourages diners to blend the familiar with the new. The fact that everything at Mezes is made fresh from scratch with the finest natural ingredients is added incentive to experiment.

Most mezedes are vegetarian or seafood. One popular vegetarian mezes is gigantes — lima beans slowly cooked with tomato sauce and dill. Seafood mezedes include several varieties with shrimp; try them broiled with garlic, fresh vegetables and lemon sauce, served with tomato sauce. You might also enjoy breaded pan-fried kalamari with a splash of wine. Among others, the meat mezedes include dolmades (vine leaves stuffed with ground beef, rice, fresh tomato and dill).

Mezes' repertoire is by no means limited to its culinary namesake. Its entrées are spectacular; nowhere will you find better fresh fish or heartier lamb chops. There's a large selection of fine Greek wines to complement any dish.

A covered waterproof pavilion in front extends the convivial joy right out into the street. Outdoors or in, the Mezes ambience and culinary excellence shine through.

Staying young old hat at 569 Danforth

Just go to Korry's dot com. You'll find everything you need right there. Then drop me an e-mail." The words roll off his tongue. A precocious teenager surfing the web? A twenty-something fashion maven?

To look at Saul Korman is to see a man who wears his 50 years in the menswear trade as crisply as the impeccably-finished garments he sports. To listen to him, however, you'd swear he was a bright-faced, bushy-tailed youngster just out of school, raring to conquer the world — not an old-school veteran of the clothing trade.

The truth is, he's both. Old school and nouveau school, happily coexistent in one person. Old school enough to still answer his own phones — no hiding behind voice mail at this address — yet hip to the fact that his website has to be cutting-edge. If loving what one does is the key to youthful longevity, then Saul Korman not only has that key, he's got it firmly chained to his cummerbund — and isn't about to surrender it any time soon.

"It's my life," he says. "I don't know anything else." These are words of passion, not resignation; it's Korman's love for every minute detail of his business that has buoyed him through the decades, and touched those who've shared the journey with him: colleagues, customers, suppliers and — most of all — his fellow merchants on the Danforth.

"Name me one street — I'm not talking Toronto, I'm talking anywhere — that has what we have"

His tireless efforts to promote his chosen street have not only endeared him to his neighbours, they've also captured the attention of an entire city. His voice fills the airwaves, leaving no one indifferent. Both his trademark off-the-cuff delivery and the phrase "Five Six Nine Danforth Avenue" are indelibly stamped on the public consciousness.

"It's show business," he croons. "I love the limelight. Where else could a guy with a Grade 10 education get this kind of run?"

Grade 10 by the book, perhaps, but in the school of life, Korman got his PhD long ago. And if you're impressed by this upstart web surfer, wait until you hear him lecture!

"Suits are back. Men are dressing up again because they're starting to look for jobs again. You need to dress for the job you want, not the job you have." According to Korman, no less an authority than President Bush "has insisted that all interviewers at his press conferences be appropriately dressed."

When Bush league is good

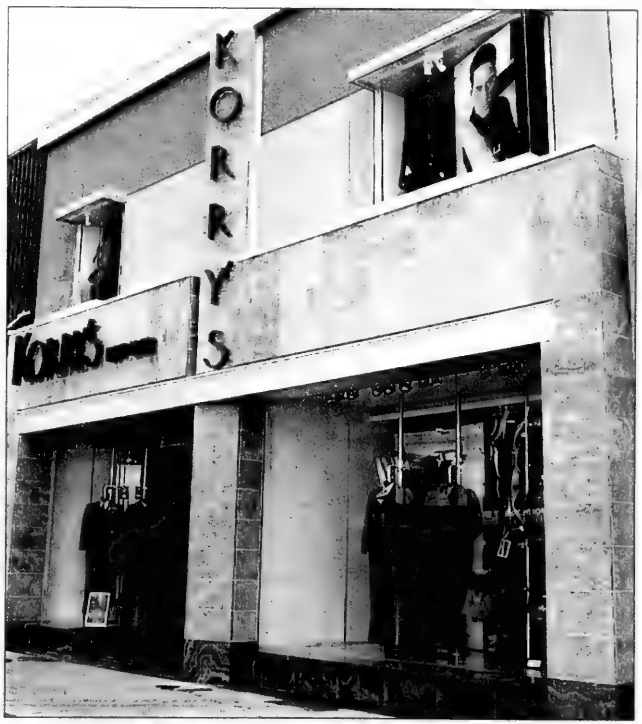
The reference to a head of state is appropriate, for Korman holds court on the Danforth as surely as Bush does in the White House. He's been called the King of the Danforth, the Mayor, the Duke, and other monikers, and they're all good, he says, "as long as they call me something." [No worries on that score]. "It means they're getting my message."

The message du jour continues: "People in general are buying better quality. As they acquire a taste for it, they come to appreciate that it looks better, feels better, lasts longer." The black Boss suit (as popularized by the film Men in Black), Korman explains, is in high demand. "It's a powerful, refined look, and it's incredibly versatile. It works for business meetings, graduations, weddings ... it takes you everywhere."

If you've heard the Korman story, you'll know that, fresh from the wilds of northern Quebec, he arrived in Toronto at the peach-fuzzed age of 18, jumped into the family business with both feet and shepherded it into the Korry's of today. In he process, he made his shtick and his street famous.

"I stayed on the farm because the greener pastures were here already"

Youth will be served, said Jack London. What he didn't say was that youth can sometimes come in the form of a sexagenarian who jackrabbits around his store on two replaced knees ("I got a two for one", he quips). He's celebrating 50 years in business, but where are the signs of winding down?



Before you can say "Five Six Nine", Korman segues into his favourite topic: the Danforth. "Name me one street, anywhere — I'm not talking Toronto, I'm talking anywhere in the world — that has what we have. The restaurants. The shops. The people." Those who ask him why he never sought greener pastures downtown may mean well, he says, but "they just don't get it. I stayed on the farm because the greener pastures were here already." Greener both literally and figuratively, he explains — never for a second would he have considered trading the European ambience, ethnic flavour and abundant greenery of the Danforth for the cement and right angles of the downtown core. "If there isn't a fruit and vegetable store every few blocks, it's not me."

Korman feels richly rewarded by his Danforth experiences. "If I never sell another suit, I'm happy". Is this really Saul Korman talking? [A telling wink]. The odds of Korman never selling another suit, of course, are about one in a million — or roughly the number of people expected at this year's Taste of the Danforth, which he's now trumpeting.

The suit he's "never" going to sell is already on your back. It fits you perfectly. You look better. You feel better. And, free of charge, you're getting a doctoral dissertation on the Danforth: 569 Good Reasons to Visit the World's Best Street.

A city. A street. A man. Fifty years and counting.

What else can one say but Mazel Tov?

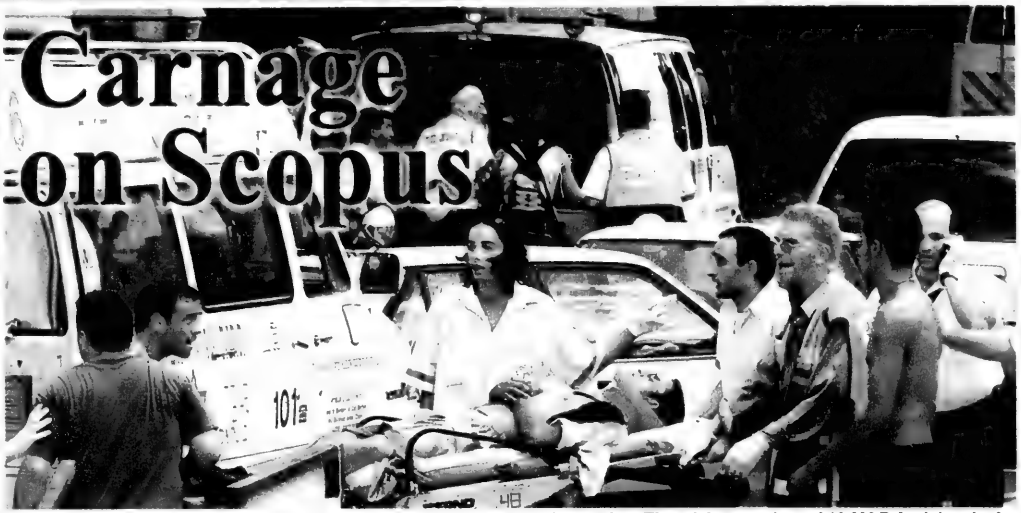
Carnage on Scopus



Seven people were killed and more than 80 wounded last Wednesday in a bombing at Hebrew University's campus on Mount Scopus. Among the seven killed were five Americans. Hamas claimed credit for the murders. That night, an estimated 10,000 Palestinians in the Gaza Strip celebrated the attack. Please see related story on page 26.

Parents frustrated with bicultural school

By ANNA MORGAN
Staff Reporter

The taxi stopped where the paved streets of the Jewish Katamonim neighbourhood of Jerusalem merge into the Arab village of Beit Shufafa's dusty road. From there the directions to the Harel-Ankova home were vague – no street address, only landmarks to follow.

Backgrounder

As I made my way over the dirt path, Rivka Harel-Ankova welcomed me into her open door and led the way to her garden, walled in by the city's ubiquitous stone.

Beneath the hot July sun, I was quickly drawn into the dilemmas facing Rivka, a Canadian-Israeli mother, and Ilan, her Moroccan-Israeli husband, over their decision to take their son, Izzie, 8, out of Hand in Hand, an integrated, bilingual school nearby where Jewish and Arab children learn together.

The bicultural school opened in Jerusalem in 1998 with the intention of providing a curriculum that would allow students to strengthen their own identities while better understanding their classmates. The integrated educational environment was an attempt to encourage friendships between students and thereby promote peaceful coexistence in the area. There are three such schools supported by the Israeli Ministry of Education today – one in the Galilee, another in Jaffa and the third, the school Izzy attended in Jerusalem.

The News in Brief

Canada

Shul Reopens

VANCOUVER — Beth Hamidrash, Canada's only Sephardi congregation west of Toronto, welcomed congregants for Shabbat services late last month in a totally new facility erected on the same site as the shul's old building. Work to finish the new building's interior was halted last summer after the 100-family congregation fell short of funds by about $500,000. Outside donors helped complete the project, which cost $1.6 million in total.

Israel

Tour Cancelled

JERUSALEM — The Israel Philharmonic cancelled a U.S. tour after it couldn't find an American security company willing to guard its 100 musicians. Avi Shoshani, chief executive of the orchestra, said security companies told the symphony's American agent they are unwilling to take the risk because of the fear of terrorist attacks. The philharmonic will go ahead with scheduled summer tours in Australia and Taiwan.

Jackson Peace Mission

JERUSALEM — U.S. civil rights leader Jesse Jackson met separately with Israeli Foreign Minister Shimon Peres and Palestinian Authority President Yasser Arafat on the first two days of a scheduled five-day peace tour last week. He said he would like to see both sides break "the cycle of retaliatory violence" but urged Arafat to "lead the way to end the bombing" and said he hoped the Palestinians would use non-violent resistance instead of terror. He later cancelled a meeting with Hamas spiritual leader Sheik Ahmed Yassin after Hamas took responsibility for the bombing at a Hebrew University cafeteria.

Taxi Driver Arrested

JERUSALEM — Israeli police have arrested an Arab taxi driver, Khaled Ashour, 41, of Jaffa, suspected of transporting two terrorists who carried out a July 17 bombing in Tel Aviv. Five people were killed, including three foreign guest workers in the double suicide bombing near Tel Aviv's old Central Bus Station. The Shin Bet domestic security service reported last week that Ashour said he picked up the bombers near the northern town of Ummel-Fahm and only realized they were terrorists when they threatened to hurt him if he refused to take them where they wanted. They allegedly first instructed Ashour to drive them to a shopping centre and then to a restaurant in central Israel, but the businesses were closed for Tisha b'Av.

World

Wiesel Museum Opens

BUCHAREST — A museum dedicated to Elie Wiesel opened near his birthplace in Romania last week. Dedicated by the Romanian government in the town of Sighetu Marmatiei, the museum will feature exhibits on the Nobel Peace Prize-winning author and on Jewish culture in the region. Half of Romania's 800,000 Jews died in the Holocaust. Fewer than 14,000 Jews live there today. Wiesel praised Romanian efforts to overcome its wartime fascist past. But a day later, after receiving the Star of Romania, the nation's highest honour, he said President Ion Iliescu had made "a noble effort" to educate Romanians about the Holocaust, but that he had not done enough.

Jews, Tutu Meet

JOHANNESBURG — South African Jewish leaders discussed ways to bring peace to the Middle East with Nobel Peace Prize laureate Archbishop Desmond Tutu. Tutu later said he felt "very good" about the outcome of the meeting. Earlier this year, Tutu irked Jewish groups by comparing Israel's treatment of the Palestinians to the treatment of blacks during South Africa's apartheid regime.

No Einstein Exhibit

BEIJING — Israel has cancelled an exhibit on Albert Einstein that was slated to open next month in China. Israel made the move after Chinese officials demanded all references to his Jewishness and support for a Jewish state be removed from the exhibit, a spokesperson for the Israeli Embassy in Beijing said. The Chinese also wanted no reference to the fact Einstein had been asked to become Israel's president.

Iraq Attack Opposed

LONDON — While in Britain to meet Prime Minister Tony Blair, Jordan's King Abdullah told the London Times he opposes U.S. efforts to topple Iraqi leader Saddam Hussein without progress first being made in the Israeli-Palestinian conflict. He said an attack on Iraq would "really open a Pandora's box."

Chirac Criticized

NEW YORK — The American Jewish Congress (AJC) has criticized French President Jacques Chirac for reportedly complaining to the Israeli foreign minister last week that American Jewish organizations were under orders from Jerusalem to portray France as an anti-Semitic country. AJC called Chirac's remarks "reminiscent of ancient anti-Semitic stereotypes of worldwide Jewish conspiracies" and "a smokescreen" to hide the fact the French government took no action against hundreds of anti-Semitic acts over the past year.

Catholic Priest Builds Jewish museum

BERLIN — A Catholic priest is building a Jewish museum near Frankfurt, Germany.

The Zimmerman-Strauss museum is expected to open in the town of Nidda in October.

"Jewish life is an important part of local history and it must be passed on to coming generations," Wolfgang Stingl told the Frankfurter Rundschau newspaper.

Stingl, who said he has been interested in Judaism since he was a child, has collected Judaica for years. Many of these items, including a prayer book, a curtain for a Torah Ark, the ceremonial blanket for wrapping a circumcised baby, and tfillin will be shown in the museum,whose building belongs to Stingl.

He said some material was given to him by former Jewish residents of Nidda who now live in Israel and in the United States. According to Stingl, a small Jewish community was founded in Nidda in the 13th century. In the early 20th century, the town had about 100 Jews. Today there are none.

Agencies urged to apply for restitution funds

Designed to aid survivors

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

Agencies that provide services to Holocaust survivors are being urged to apply to the Claims Conference for restitution funds to be distributed in the coming year.

Jewish Holocaust Survivors of Canada and Canadian Jewish Congress, both of which have a seat on the board of the Claims Conference, have sent notices to various agencies across Canada informing them of the funds available, said Michael Rosenberg, president of the survivors' group.

The allocations committee of the Claims Conference is scheduled to convene in November and agencies must get their applications in before then, said Keith Landy, president of Congress and a delegate to the recent meeting of the Conference in Luxembourg.

Eighty per cent of the funds allocated go to organizations that serve survivors, he said. However, in recent years "there has been either a reluctance to apply or lack of knowledge." Applications must be submitted on an annual basis, he said.

In past years, the Baycrest Centre and Circle of Care in Toronto have received allocations while disbursements have also been provided to agencies in Montreal, Winnipeg and Vancouver, Rosenberg said.

Generally, funds are allocated on the basis of an 80-20 split, with the bulk of the money going to social welfare programs and the remainder to Holocaust education projects.

Survivors can also apply on an individual basis for compensation for slave labour, Rosenberg said. Sixty-five per cent of all those eligible for compensation have already received some payment, while the balance of the funds allocated for this purpose will be distributed by the end of the year. A maximum of approximately $8,600 is available per person.

In the future, survivors of ghettos can expect to receive compensation for their imprisonment as well. Advertisements will be placed in newspapers explaining how to file a claim, Rosenberg said.

Meanwhile, news reports from Luxembourg, where the Claims Conference marked the 50th anniversary of the signing of the survivor compensation agreement with Germany, indicated a major organizational shakeup is being proposed.

Israel Singer, president of the Claims Conference and co-chair of the World Jewish Restitution Organization (WJRO), has suggested a merger of the two organizations. Such a move would make restitution efforts more efficient, he argued.

However, the proposal was met with some resistance, with opponents saying it could lead to turf wars and would not resolve an ongoing debate as to how the restitution funds should best be distributed.

In the past, some survivors have complained that too much of the compensation money is going to Jewish organization and lawyers, and not enough to survivors themselves.

There's also a disagreement over whether survivors in less affluent countries than Canada should receive a greater proportion of the funds available.

"There will always be controversy over the distribution of money," Rosenberg stated.

Estimates put the number of Canadian Jews living in poverty at between 15,000 and 20,000, and among them are Holocaust survivors, Rosenberg said. These people are also in need of support from restitution funds.

When he suggested in an earlier interview with The CJN that perhaps "Holocaust survivors in better means would help those who are not, I was blasted with letters to the editor."

Rosenberg said many survivors believe their needs in Canada are as great as those experienced elsewhere. Others would like to see more of the funds going to survivors in other countries.

As to the proposed organizational shakeup, Landy noted the present day organizations were established long ago. "The artificial separation between the WJRO and the Claims Conference have blurred over the years."

Singer, along with Edgar Bronfman, was instrumental in pushing for creation of the fund that is now being allocated to survivors. "If he says it will provide a more streamlined approach, I daresay that will happen," Landy said. The result will be "just one organization that people can turn to."

The Claims Conference as set up 50 years ago to administer the restitution funds provided by Germany. It has distributed $50 billion US to more than 500,000 Holocaust survivors.

The WJRO was created in 1992 to deal with restitution issues outside of Germany and Austria. The Claims Conference is a founding member of the WJRO, which also includes representation from the Jewish Agency for Israel, B'nai Brith, the American Jewish Joint Distribution Committee and survivor organizations.

The Claims Conference has paid or is finalizing payment to almost 100,000 slave labourers, mostly in eastern Europe. The sums include nearly $500 million US from a German foundation and $94 million from Swiss banks, with another $12.9 million yet to be advanced from the funds.

–With files from JTA

Seen at a recent meeeting of the Claims Conference is (from left) Keith Landy, president of Canadian Jewish Congress; Julius Berman, chair of the board and of the executive committee, and Rabbi Dr. Israel Singer, president of The Material Claims Conference. The meeting took place at Luxembourg City Hall, the place where the original Luxembourg Agreements were signed with Germany in 1952.

The ambassador was wrong

From the editor's desk

The man whose photo appears in the middle of this column, is Abas Sayad. He is 36 years old and, until last week when he was captured by Israeli security forces, was the leader of Hamas in Tulkarm.

Sayed is accused of planning a mass cyanide poisoning of Israelis. The charge is hardly farfetched, because Israeli authorities have also amassed a great deal of evidence that he sent a suicide bomber on the evening of March 27 to the Park Hotel in Netanya, where 29 Israelis were killed as they sat down at the seder table on the first night of Pesach.

Last week, Sayed's colleagues perpetrated yet another brutal atrocity on unarmed, innocent civilians. This time it was against a group of students and their friends in a cafeteria at Hebrew University on Mount Scopus.

It was lunchtime on a sunny Wednesday afternoon. The eatery in the Frank Sinatra Building on Mount Scopus was experiencing its peak customer traffic of the day. One of Sayed's Hamas confederates surreptitiously but unremarkably carried a nails-studded explosive hidden in a bag into the cafeteria. He deposited the bag on a table, left the room, left the vicinity and ignited the explosive by remote control.

As of this writing, 7 people have been reported killed, five of them American citizens. More than 80 people were injured, 12 of them critically.

The Hamas press release that accompanied the murders said the bombing was "a first response" for the death of Saleh Shehadeh, founder of the organization's Izzadin al Qassam military wing, and for the deaths of the 15 civilians in the Gaza bombing that killed Shehadeh last month.

The author of the press statement had obviously deliberately omitted any reference to the failed suicide slaughter at a falafel shop the previous day in Jerusalem – presumably because the bomber alone and not even one Zionist died in the operation.

The day after the Hebrew U murders, the American ambassador to Israel, Dan Kurtzer, a former student at the university, made the following observation. "The terrorist murderers – those who sent them and those whose action and inaction contributed to this despicable act – have descended to a new depth of depravity."

While I share the depth of the ambassador's shock and disgust, it is hard to agree with his assessment regarding Hamas' depravity.

Hamas owes its existence, its raison d'etre, its reason for living, so to speak, to one, and only one, quite depraved objective: the annihilation of another state and its people – Israel.

Hamas' charter, suffused with references to "the Zionists" and "the Jews," makes this explicit.

The preamble contains the following: "Israel will rise and remain intact until Islam eliminates it as it eliminated its predecessors."

In the introduction, the Charter reads: "This is the charter of the Islamic Resistance Movement (Hamas) which will reveal its face, unveil its identity, state its position, clarify its purpose, discuss its hopes, call for support to its cause and reinforcement, and for joining its ranks. For our struggle against the Jews is extremely wide-ranging and grave, so much so that it will need all the loyal efforts we can wield, to be followed by further steps and reinforced by successive battalions from the multifarious Arab and Islamic world, until the enemies are defeated and Allah's victory prevails."

There are 36 articles in the Charter. They amount to a constitution for the deconstruction of another state, a blueprint for "politicide," if not genocide as well.

"Only when [the Zionists] have completed digesting the area on which they will have laid their hand, they will look forward to more expansion. Their scheme has been laid out in the Protocols of the Elders of Zion... Leaving the circle of conflict with Israel is a major act of treason and it will bring a curse on its perpetrators." (From Article 32)

Abas El Sayad

There are indeed many conflicts throughout the world. Blood is also being spilled on soil other than that of Israel. But the majority of those conflicts are territorial disputes between nations or are disputes for control between similar but competing ethnic forces.

Is there any other country on earth whose very legitimacy as a country, whose sovereign existence and right to live, are denied on religious grounds by those whose chief means of confrontation deliberately targets children, defenceless individuals, helpless civilians and visiting students?

There can be no greater depths than the depravity in which Hamas already operates, glorifying and sanctifying the shedding of blood in the name of a God who must weep at the sight.

Alas, the ambassador was wrong.

Young leaders join Keren Hayesod initiative

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Richard Diamond, chair of UIA Federation Canada's national young leadership executive, believes that if you're not working on developing new young leaders, you're not developing the future of your community.

A "young leader" himself in the Jewish community (the category encompasses ages 22 to 45), Diamond, 41, has taken a proactive approach to putting his beliefs into practice.

Last year he was asked by Harvey Wolfe, chair of Keren Hayesod, the fund-raising arm of the Jewish Agency for countries outside the United States, to become involved in developing international young leadership in the organization, as he did several years ago for the national group.

Since that time, Diamond has been to Israel twice, once in March at an international meeting attended by 100 senior leaders from around the world, and again in June to meet with counterparts from countries including Australia, England, South Africa, France, Germany and Poland.

Participants met with the director general of Keren Hayesod, Gad Ben-Ari, making the meeting "pretty high-profile," said Diamond, who is in the real estate development business. He did a Power Point presentation that included ideas on how to use business concepts to improve fund-raising effectiveness.

Now there is an international young leadership executive, although its mandate is not yet defined, Diamond said.

Lynn Kirshin, a former co-chair of Toronto's young leadership cabinet and an executive committee member of national young leadership, is one of six representatives on the international young leadership committee. The other representative from an English-speaking country is from Australia.There are also representatives from Europe and from Latin American countries.

Kirshin, a 36-year-old policy analyst, is excited about the "momentum you gain from having an international unified body. You can do much more."

Some of the group's initial goals include creating and maintaining a chain of communication among young leadership groups around the world, analyzing campaigns around the world and proposing ways to assist new campaigns, possibly through mentoring.

Although the specifics of campaign activities may vary from country to country, one thing Kirshin and her counterparts share is a love of Israel.

"It seemed everyone was interested in the same sort of things, raising money and putting the money to good use in Israel and the local community.

"The e-mails have been flying."

Jewish film posters tell a never-ending story

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

Jerry Faivish calls his collection of 5,000 Jewish posters a never-ending story.

"Posters are a history of the moment," says the Toronto lawyer, who has more than 400 posters about Jewish films in his collection.

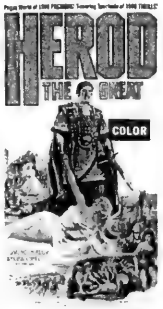
About 60 of those film posters are currently part of an exhibit, on until December, at the Steven Spielberg Jewish Film Archive at the Hebrew University of Jerusalem.

As the official film archive of the World Zionist Organization, it houses the largest collection of Jewish documentary film footage in the world, including material shot before and after the establishment of the State of Israel, motion picture records of many Diaspora communities and two special collections related to the Holocaust.

Marilyn Koolik, archive director, says she discovered Faivish's collection after he came to her office looking for an archive poster.

"When he told me about his collection, I knew it would make a powerful exhibit," she said in an interview from Israel.

She arranged a trip to Canada to view the posters and discovered a collection "that spoke to me. It mirrored what we have on film."



She selected a group that ranged from the early 1920s to the 1980s. "Among others, I chose biblical film posters, and film posters from the '50s, which are full of Hollywood hype."

The first film poster he acquired, said Faivish, was from a 1940s German film about the Rothschilds. "There was a censor stamp on it. Every movie had to have government approval.

"Since every movie was censored, people only learned about what the government wanted them to learn about. All they heard was anti-Jewish propaganda.

"A bombardment of anti-Semitic posters could cause people to think of Jews as less than human. When Jews were exterminated, people did not think they were dealing with human beings," Faivish said.

Each poster has its own "reason for being. Some are intrinsically beautiful, while others tell a story. A poster advertising plays produced in a post World War II refugee camp is powerful because it depicts part of our history."

Sometimes things happen because of a poster, said Faivish. "For example, this exhibit came about as a result of my seeking out the archive poster. It was divine providence."

He said you can learn a lot about people and their histories by how they react to a poster exhibition.

"One woman was moved by the Ten Commandments poster because she first saw the movie with her grandmother. That is a personal recollection, but it adds to a person's history.

"A poster reflects our history, but what people tell about the poster adds to our knowledge," he said.

Koolik said that the exhibit has turned a main corridor at Hebrew University into a gallery. "It is an amazing location. Whoever comes to the university cannot avoid seeing it. They always stop and look.

"These are very difficult times, and it is wonderful to see how the posters make people smile. The stories behind them, and the colours and designs all bring out memories. It adds something to people's day," said Koolik.

"The righteous man is an everlasting foundation."

Former Ontario judge prepares to mark 100 years

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

In a chat over lunch at the Forest Hill Place retirement home on Castlefield Avenue, centenarian Abraham (Abe) Lieff, a former justice of the Ontario Supreme Court and the first Jewish lawyer named to the Ontario high court, reflects on the many achievements he has made in his personal life and his career.

"Looking back, I've had a lot of fun," he says. "I've met many wonderful people," he says.

The things that stand out in his mind, he says, are "Nationally, the establishment of the State of Israel – that's our peoplehood – and personally, marrying Saidie [Lazarovitz, who died in 1999] in 1929 and having a wonderful life with her for 70 years, short a couple of months."

Former Justice Abraham (Abe) Lieff approaches his 100th birthday.

Lieff, who speaks passionately about his concern for the Jewish state, and Sadie visited Israel half a dozen times.

"I'm pleased that today, Jews can be in every big law firm, hospital, university – and all of this happened after the State of Israel was born," he says.

Lieff was one of seven children born to Esther and Bernard Lifshitz in the White Russian shtetl of Antopol in the province of Grodno. The family fled the anti-Semitic pogroms there in 1904 and came to Ottawa when Lieff was one year old.

Lieff attended Ottawa Collegiate Institute and was called to the bar at Osgoode Hall in 1926. He rose to become a well-known Ottawa lawyer and assistant Crown attorney. He became a magistrate in Carleton County before moving to Toronto in 1963, when he became a justice of the Supreme Court of Ontario at the age of 60. He was the first to take his oath of office holding a Jerusalem Bible, and the first to wear a kippah during the ceremony.

Became a justice of the Supreme Court of Ontario at the age of 60

In 1978, he retired at the mandatory age of 75, and then became a family law counsellor for 13 years, continuing to make changes in divorce and family law as a family law commissioner. (He advocated doing away with the adversary system in divorce.)

As a young man, Lieff worked as a newsboy, bellhop, soda jerk, an extra in various productions at the old Russell Theatre and a banjo player. He also recalls delivering a telegram to Sir Wilfred Laurier while he was working as a telegram delivery man.

"He chatted with me and gave me a generous tip for my services," he says.

He also taught Sunday school at Holy Blossom Temple to earn money for law school.

He says religion has played an important part in shaping his views. He still has strong links with Ottawa's Jewish community and Agudath Israel Congregation, the first Conservative synagogue in Ottawa which he founded and served as president for 15 years. He also served as chair of the board of education of Ottawa's Talmud Torah system and the national vice-president of United Synagogue of America. Today he attends services regularly at Beth Tzedec Congregation.

Lieff has two daughters, Miriam, of Springfield, Mass., and Lois, a senior officer of the Jewish Education Council of Montreal, five grandchildren and seven great-grandchildren.

Lieff has received numerous honours, including a human relations award from the Canadian Council of Christians and Jews in 1976. The annual Lieff scholarship for excellence in family law at the Law Society of Upper Canada was established in 1978.

He has also published an autobiographical memoir titled Gathering Rosebuds, published in 1991 by Gall-Papenburg Computer Systems in Toronto. It details a lifetime of service in such organizations as St. Vincent's Hospital, the Masons, the Kiwanis Club of Ottawa (he served as president of the Ottawa club in 1950), John Howard Society, Big Brothers, Canadian Jewish Congress and the Liberal Party.

For the past few years, Lieff has been sending photos and memorabilia to the Ottawa Jewish Archives and recounting stories of old times in Ottawa.

When asked what activity he enjoys most as he nears 100 years of age, he replies with typical humour, "I like getting up in the morning."

Excitement of policing attracted woman officer

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

Rennie Johnson's mom didn't like it much when, as a child, Johnson did anything that could be construed as even slightly dangerous.

As a Holocaust survivor, Eva Berchard had seen more than her share of danger, and as Johnson describes it, Berchard tried her best to protect her daughter from every unsafe situation, even those that were really not very dangerous.

Perhaps it's rebellion against those strictures that accounts for Johnson's unorthodox career choice as a gun-toting officer with the Toronto Police Service. Or maybe she has some hereditary pre-disposition to the work, as her late father, Simon, was briefly a police officer in pre-war Poland.

Either way, Johnson, 44, can recall that even as a five-year-old girl, the excitement would build as the family vehicle passed by the local police station in her native Winnipeg.

"My mom would say I'd be like a dog hanging out the window... I always had a strong interest in policing," Johnson said.

It was not a career choice her parents encouraged, but after moving to Toronto 23 years ago, and after being bored by an office job in a downtown business tower, Johnson was accepted as a police recruit.

Fresh out of police college, she was immediately assigned to 51 Division, the downtown detachment in the middle of one of the more colourful sections of town. It is bounded by Rosedale in the north, the lakeshore in the south, the Don River in the east and Jarvis Street in the west.

The area includes Regent Park, home to many upstanding citizens, but also home to many prostitutes, pimps, drug dealers and drug users – "a high volume of people with problems in life," as Johnson puts it.

As a beat cop, Johnson was exposed to the seamiest side of Toronto society. "I was involved in shootings, homicide, sexual assaults, in all aspects of police work," she said.

It was the kind of work that no doubt made her parents cringe.

"I've been in a situation a few times where I had my gun drawn," she said, "but I managed to defuse it."

On one New Year's Eve, she recalled, she and her partner were called to investigate a domestic disturbance. When they knocked on the apartment door, they were confronted by a man wielding a meat cleaver. The officers drew their firearms but managed to calm the individual, and there was no shooting.

Domestic disputes – not incidents involving drug dealers or hookers – are the most volatile, Johnson said. "You're dealing with very heavy emotions."

Policing is something like firefighting, she explained. In both professions, you experience "99 per cent boredom, and one per cent sheer terror, but you live for those moments of terror.

"It's the unpredictability of the job that offers the excitement."

Johnson believes that, as a woman, she brings a calming influence to tense situations, as well as a different approach than many male officers.

Some of her fellow officers, she said, resort to force when confronted with individuals who refuse to comply.

"I can't out-muscle them, so I try to outwit them."

Johnson admits to being in "a few hairy situations, but none where my life was in danger."

She said her career choice might in part be "a rebellion" against her parents' over-protectiveness. "I wanted to do something exciting in my life, and I looked at policing as an exciting career."

Among her assignments, she has gone undercover to smoke out drug dealers, she has infiltrated after-hours booze cans and she has posed as a prostitute to bust johns.

Dangerous assignments, to be sure, but one of Johnson's biggest fears was being assigned to provide security for neo-Nazi Ernst Zundel, whose "bunker" used to be located on Carlton Street, in the middle of 51 Division. Zundel, who has moved to the United States, often received police protection, but "it would have posed a huge conflict for me, with my parents as Holocaust survivors," Johnson said.

Luckily, she was never given that assignment.

About two months ago, Johnson gave up her beat at 51 Division and took a job as a training and education officer in the leadership development section of the police college. It's a desk job that's more or less nine-to-five, but it was something she felt she had to do as a single mom caring for two small children. Shift work was no longer in the cards.

In her new job, she handles diversity training for non-front-line officers and civilian employees. It's important for police officers to appreciate the city's diversity, including cultural groups, gays, and lesbians, people with disabilities and the elderly, she said.

Johnson said the Toronto Police Service has changed in her 18 years on the force. At one time, you were more likely to hear unintended comments that were somewhat derogatory. But as the wider culture has changed and those kind of comments have become unacceptable, police culture has shifted, she said.

While policing is still not a profession pushed by many Jewish parents, Johnson would encourage anyone to consider it. She invites anyone interested in discussing policing as a career to call her at 416-808-4802.

Grudging conclusion from the UN

The United Nations last week released its report into the alleged massacre in Jenin during the incursion by the Israel Defence Forces there last April. It concluded, without reservation, that no massacre and no atrocities occurred there.

That finding, however, did not deter Palestinian Authority cabinet minister Nabil Sha'ath from saying that the report "identified what happened in Jen'n as a war crime and a crime against humanity." His statement, of course, was an outright lie, just as the accusations made against Israel and the IDF in the aftermath of the fighting in Jenin were also outright lies.

To be sure, the report contained the obligatory criticisms of Israel. No UN-authored report could ever be released without any. Israel was condemned for creating "severe hardships" for the Palestinians and for endangering civilians by relying upon heavy weaponry in densely-populated areas. Israel was also criticized for obstructing humanitarian workers, who, "in many instances," the report said, "were not able to reach people in need to assess conditions and deliver necessary assistance because of the sealing of cities, refugee camps and villages."

But in a departure from the precedent established by most UN reports, it also contained a rebuke of sorts aimed at the Palestinians, who were faulted for allowing some 200 armed fighters to use Jenin as their base of operations against Israel.

[Illustration by Michael Nissimov]

UN Secretary-General Kofi Annan had originally commissioned a panel to investigate the allegations of massacre. But when it became clear to Israel – by dint of the panel's composition, its terms of reference and Annan's unwillingness to accede to certain Israeli procedural requests – that the deck would be stacked against it, the Israeli cabinet decided not to co-operate. Annan had to call off the panel.

But, acquiescing to the agenda of its Arab members, the General Assembly requested, nevertheless, that a report be written on the IDF's conduct in Jenin. In the absence of even a flimsy thread of evidence, the authors of the report were unable to weave any fabric of massacre. The tone of the report is a grudging acknowledgment of that fact.

The real crimes at Jenin were perpetrated by the Palestinian fighters. They continue to perpetrate such crimes to this day. As Jerome Marcus, a former attorney with the U.S. State Department wrote in The Wall Street Journal in April, "Rather than 'trying to separate, to the extent possible, from military objectives,' the Palestinians went out of their way to hide military objectives behind, in, around and under civilian (and even humanitarian) objectives… The Palestinian terrorists, having planted themselves among civilians, have harvested a fresh crop of victims which they are now using for public relations purposes."

Ironically, last week's report will not help the Palestinian leadership achieve those purposes. But who, if anyone, is listening?

Alarmed by Israel's approach

We are alarmed by the Israeli-Palestinian situation, and as Jewish women and daughters of a Holocaust survivor, we feel it is our responsibility to express our concern about Israel's violent approach to resolving the conflict.

The Jewish people will survive, and Israel will continue to exist, as it should. However, we would rather our identity and survival be affirmed and reaffirmed through our skill as negotiators, and through our patience, generosity and compassion. Jewishness must not be secured through violence, the destruction of people's homes, the withholding of food, water, medical aid, the refusal to negotiate for land and the refusal of a right of return out of exile. Righteous Gentiles have been honoured for taking the risk of going against the dominant and repressive policies of the Nazi regime. Now it is our turn as Jewish women whose very existence is owed to those Righteous Gentiles, to turn to Israel and say, "This is wrong." In time, when the Palestinians look back at all the factors that contributed to the establishment of a free and prosperous Palestine, it is my wish that they have cause to thank the Righteous Jews for what they had the courage to give.

Banish prejudice, hate

As a Christian who lived in North York for 31 years, I was often served in various stores by people with numbers tattooed on their arm and became very aware of the pain of some of my immediate neighbours who were Holocaust survivors. For over 30 years, I have been involved in trying to help Christians understand the ramifications of the Holocaust and how the interpretation of Scripture by some Christians has fed, and still feeds, anti-Semitism. The recent murder of David Rosenzweig, whether a hate crime or random crime, is particularly tragic since his mother, a Holocaust survivor, is alive to mourn him. Whether Jewish or not, we are appalled at this brutal murder in the heart of the Jewish community in Toronto.

The constant barrage of criticism of Israel as it tries to defend itself from terrorist attacks and the hostility of some toward Jews here in Canada must add to the feelings of despair and sadness in the Jewish community. Many Christians pray for the peace of Jerusalem and for peace to take root in the hearts and minds of all peoples in the Middle East. May we Christians in Canada especially learn or continue to love our neighbour and to do our part to help banish prejudice and hate.

Reader troubled by complacency

I am deeply troubled. The present world situation seems incomprehensible; it confuses any sane, thinking person's vision of a world where so much potential for good exists and so much natural beauty abounds.

God must be weeping with frustration at the way human beings are wasting the possibilities for positive energy in the universe. Perhaps He is frustrated with humanity's inability to do better. I know I am.

I attend rallies and parlour meetings, plan trips to Israel, write letters, advocate, boycott countries and products where anti-Semitism is growing, raise money for Israel, call and assist families there. Yet I still feel helpless, despite understanding the importance of the power of one act and one voice.

We have a marvellous and strong Jewish community in Canada. So many care and give endless energies to do whatever they can.

But many detach and stand back. Travel plans remain unchanged. Trips to France and Europe continue. Ignorance grows. The "it-doesn't-really-affect-us-here" attitude remains unspoken. We are complacent because we live easy lives away from the stark realities of problems that have implications for all of us. We forget about doing good.

We must continue to educate ourselves on the facts. We must make personal decisions to help in many ways, every day. We must talk to our kids and our friends, our colleagues and our aquaintances. We must go to elementary and secondary schools, university campuses; we must speak out at synagogues and meetings.

I will be less troubled when each of us decides that our voices and actions matter. Every day. Everywhere. Now.

Bnei Akiva still goes to Israel

At this difficult time, it is more important than ever for us in the Jewish community to show our support for, and identity with, the State of Israel by visiting, encouraging others to visit, and ultimately moving to the Jewish state. Your readers may be interested to know that Bnei Akiva continues to send teenagers to Israel every summer on our Mach Hach b'Aretz program. Almost 200 high school students left this week on our intensive six-week Israel study-tour. The group included 16 Canadians.

A visit to Iran

By MARLENE FINE

The courtyard of the synagogue in the city of Isfahan in central Iran is crowded with young boys playing soccer. They are dressed in blue jeans and baseball caps. Behind them, a dozen young and middle-aged women sit together talking in Farsi, Iran's native language. They are waiting for their children's Hebrew classes to end. They wear long coats, as is the custom for Iranian women, and scarves or hijab on their heads, as is the law. Although there are only 2,000 Jews living in Isfahan today, 12 synagogues are still in use.

This city began as a Jewish settlement. Its original name meant "House of Jews." For at least 2,500 years, Persia, as Iran was known until the 1934 name change, has been a home to Jews. They came here after their exile from Israel and the destruction of the First Temple.

Though the total number of Jews in Iran today is estimated at 20-30,000, down from 70,000 in 1968, it is still the largest number in the Middle East outside of Israel.

Why Jews continue to live in a country where the official religion is Islam and the country supports the destruction of the State of Israel is difficult for Jews outside of Iran to understand.

A visit to the 65-year-old Isfahan synagogue on Ostandary Avenue reveals only an optimistic future for Jews here. Renovations began a few years ago and continue in the adjoining building, which houses the new mikvah, schoolrooms and the salon used for celebrations. In the synagogue itself, Yehuda, one of the five leaders of the city's Jewish community, shows us the new doors on the arc, hand-painted in the Persian floral style which matches the bimah built by his father. Colourful carpets cover all the floors, also in the Persian style. Ornate chandeliers draw our attention to the ladies' section in the balcony.

Yehuda is small in stature and smartly dressed in jeans and a sport shirt. He graduated from Tehran University 31 years ago and now works as an architect and teaches at the university in Isfahan. He also owns a retail store that openly displays Hebrew writing and has a Muslim clerk. He has no plans to emigrate, although a brother and sister live in the United States and another sister lives in Israel. He says he has close friends who are Muslim. "The men are like brothers; the women like sisters," he says in good English, while lacing the fingers of both hands together to indicate a strong bond.

But in the next breath, he says that in a court of law, a Jew is of less value than a Muslim and can expect harsher treatment. He does not confess to any worry that this bond of friendship might not be strong enough to withstand a resurgence of the blatant anti-Semitism of the past.

Persecution of the Jewish minority has a long history in Iran. Treated as unclean, forced to wear red identity badges and live in filthy ghettos and limited in their choice of occupations, most Jews eked out a meagre living in isolation, not just from the rest of the country but from the world.

Not until the early 20th century, when freedom for the three main religious minorities – Judaism, Armenian Christianity and Zoroastrianism – was enshrined in the Iranian constitution, did Jews begin to be a part of civil society. It also granted one seat each in the Iranian parliament to the Jews and the Zoroastrians, and two to the Armenian Christians. That not one of these representatives had great power was not an issue. For the Jewish community, it meant recognition and legitimization. But as long as Muslim religious leaders were also the political leaders of the country, Jews continued to be treated as less than full citizens.

This started to change when Mohammed Reza Pahlavi took power in 1941. He was committed to a policy of westernizing Iran and he separated politics from religion by severely limiting the power of the mullahs.

The entrance to the Tehran synagogue.

During this period, there was a revival of Iran's Jewish people. According to Habib Levy in his book, The Jews of Iran, "Jews were so prominent in economics, industry, commerce, higher education, administration and in the arts and sciences that it was absolutely unbelievable that their roots were in the hellish ghettos in which their forefathers had taken refuge from persecutions and massacres… The years of Mohammed Reza Shah's reign may be considered the zenith of Jewish Iranian well-being and prosperity."

It was during the Shah's time that the relationship between Iran and Israel blossomed. As Levy says, "The king repeatedly affirmed Israel's right to exist."

But in 1979, the Shah was forced into exile and Ayatollah Khomeini returned to Iran. He declared it an Islamic Republic and placed conservative Muslim religious leaders in control of the government. Because Jews had profited so well under the Shah, they were held to account for his cruel regime and his recognition of Israel. Anti-Semitic acts increased. Some Jews lost their jobs while others had their land confiscated. Under Ayatollah Khomeini, Iran helped to form and fund the Hezbollah, and today the country continues to support Hamas and the Islamic Jihad, all organizations dedicated to the destruction of Israel.

Jewish shopkeepers in Isfahan [Malcolm Alexandroff photos]

After the revolution, some 40,000 Jews left for North America and Israel. The signs of the Jews' exodus can be seen in large bazaars where Chanukah menorahs and other Jewish items are for sale, sacrificed in order to lighten suitcases.

All Jews we talked to said they now have religious freedom. There are no security guards on synagogue gates and there is no camouflaging of the buildings' purpose. Hebrew is now allowed to be taught freely. Formerly, only Halachah could be taught in Hebrew while all other lessons were given in Farsi. And recently, they have been allowed to close their schools on Saturdays. They are also allowed to make and use wine for religious purposes, even though the possession of alcohol is illegal for Muslims. And, at Passover, the Tehran Jewish community produces matzah for all of Iran.

But even recent history shows that this so-called freedom is at the mercy of the whims of the Muslim religious and political leaders. The 1999 arrests and convictions of Jews on charges of spying for Israel are at the forefront of everyone's mind. In Isfahan, Yehuda tells us of the 24-year-old Hebrew teacher from their city who is one of those imprisoned.

Escalation of the conflict between the Israelis and Palestinians causes Jews to become fearful of a backlash, so they try to distance themselves from the Jewish State. Last May, the Tehran Jewish community issued a statement condemning the actions of the Israeli army in Jenin.

In Tehran, only 10,000 Jews remain. Sarah is a 28-year-old dentist there. We met her at Saturday morning services in the Synagogue Haim Iran. She spoke English haltingly, but was eager to talk to us. She said she loves her country but we were doubtful because she spoke only of fear. Mail is inspected, she said, and e-mail is monitored. Correspondence from officials of western Jewish organizations is suspect. Could her loyalty be questioned? She politely refused to give us her last name. But, she said, the only reason she is thinking of leaving Iran is because she wants to marry a Jew.

"Once or twice a year," she said, "a Jew marries a Muslim and we are sad and angry."

In fact, intermarriage and conversions have became common in the last half of the last century.

In Hamadan, in western Iran, home to just 35 Jews, the site of the tombs of Esther and Mordecai is a stop for most tourists. As we entered the well-maintained shrine, we saw two Iranian men in their 50s, davening. Whether this was actually Esther's resting place or that of a later fifth-century Jewish queen, as some experts say, we were reminded of the story of Purim, and we understood a little more the significance of ancient Persia in Jewish history as a result.

Outside the mausoleum, we met Jacob, who was born in Hamadan but now lives in Tehran. He was visiting the shrine with his brother, who immigrated to Los Angeles 25 years ago. Although he was granted only a 17-day visa, we had no problem getting visas for three months.

Jacob is in charge of two of the 22 synagogues in Tehran. All have Shabbat services, he said, while seven or eight conduct services every day. Yes, he said in English, he could leave Iran if he wanted to, but his brother is not happy in California and wants to come back. This, even though Jacob was fired from his job at Iran Air because he is Jewish, he said. Their ties to Iran are complex. Is it defiance, we wondered, that keeps Jacob here?

Today, Jews and Muslims in Iran have extraordinarily similar political views. When there is no democracy, they say, everyone suffers and no one is free.

And although there are graffiti and many billboards say "Death to America" or words to that effect (we saw an anti-Israel billboard), many Iranians go to university in the United States and most have family who have emigrated there.

Discontent is growing within Iran. The economy is in decline, fuelled in part by an extreme growth in population, which is now at 70 million up from 30 million in 1978. The unemployment rate is more than 13 per cent and inflation is estimated at close to 20 per cent. A new Iranian aphorism circulating says: "When a mullah dies, a tulip grows from his grave. We would like all Iran to be a garden of tulips."

In the Isfahan synagogue courtyard, classes are over and mothers collect their children. These young Jewish Iranians might experience yet another revolution in Iran as their parents did before them. Too often, instability has been a signal for governments to divert attention from real economic and political issues by blaming Jews for the problems. This time, however, the outcome of the revolution might well determine whether this 2,500-year-old Jewish civilization survives.

Where is Canada?

Spending a week in Washington, D.C., makes one aware of a number of things, some very interesting and others less so.

Not surprisingly, politics, and especially the American brand, plays a role in the media coverage. I read the Washington Post every day, and found it to be an interesting experience, for we do not have that kind of newspaper in Canada. Toronto's Globe and Mail and the National Post are vaguely comparable, but different in one essential aspect: As in other Canadian papers and journals, news from the United States is often, if not always, front and centre when it comes to non-Canadian events. But while the Post brought me information from all over the globe every day, I found not a single news item about Canada that was deemed interesting enough to be reported. Which makes me aware, once again, that for the average newspaper reader in the United States, Canada remains an unknown land. Fortunately, I said to myself, Canada had no disasters at the time that were severe enough to warrant an exception.

Rabbi Gunther Plaut in Toronto

The reason for this situation is not hard to understand, for the disregard of Canada reflects the mouse-and-elephant syndrome: The big animal is aware of the smaller one only when it becomes bothersome. I did not have the time to find out whether the recent softwood problem that pitted the two nations against each other had made the news when the controversy was at its height. My guess is that it may have been mentioned briefly, but I'm not sure.

I tried to comfort myself with the thought that, after all, Mexico too did not make it into the Post during my stay in Washington, but I found that to be of little relevance. If I break a bone, the fact that someone else has the same problem may be interesting, but hardly comforting.

Of course, there is a lot going on in Washington, which takes me a long time to absorb, and that lessened the distress of knowing that Canada is invisible from there. Oh yes, on the page where the world's temperatures are reported, Canada too was mentioned. That, however, is small relief, since it had been brutally hot in both countries.

I have since come home to Toronto, which, when I wrote this column, was in the early stages of the Pope's visit. By the time you read this, the visit will already be history. Religious fervor, peacefully expressed, can be enormously energizing, and I am happy to note that this was Toronto's experience with the papal visit.

Conclusion of this Chapter

It is hard to believe that two years have gone by since I first started to write this column. As I sit here from my desk at camp writing my final edition of this assignment, I cannot help but think about the profound changes that have taken place in the world in past two years.

Darcie Richler in Halifax

Two years ago at this time, Israel was a much safer place. The twin towers felt little vulnerability and when we heard about the country Afghanistan, it was more about the poor treatment of women than about terrorism. Now, of course, we feel uncertainty looming everywhere. Even here, at Camp Kadimah this summer, much has changed with respect to camp policy and the safety of the campers.

Leaving Halifax this past April brought on a whole palette of feelings. It was a relief to finally be finished university (my undergraduate degree, anyway), but with it came the inevitable question of "What next?" Because I cannot clearly answer that question just yet (please give me a week or so and hopefully this will all be solved), I will tell you in general terms what I plan for the next couple of years.

First of all, I will learn from the people around me and not jump into graduate school without some time to travel and experience something new. This past semester at school, I came to the realization that I am in no way willing to rush myself through the next couple of years. I am going to do my best not to succumb to the pressures that so many of my peers have felt to go right into something without trying out a few options first.

For some reason, there are many people around me who believe that not knowing what you want to do for the rest of your life at the age of 22 is a bad thing. Let me just say that there are many other people in my position right now, and we are all trying to figure it out on our own time. We know where we want to end up eventually, but the journey itself has not yet been established.

Yet while there is certainly some shock in not knowing where I will be or what I will be doing in a couple of months, it is exhilarating to know that whatever I'm doing, I will be experiencing something new.

In the meantime, with the new excitement of starting a new chapter in the fall, I am beginning to see that my camp days might be over. Being at camp is strange and fantastic at the same time. The summer is always better for me when I spend it outside, but I am feeling a little melancholy about the prospect that this could be my last summer on staff here. This is perhaps my only regret in not knowing where I will be next month.

Camp, especially Camp Kadimah, is such a special place to be. It could be the reason why I have not driven myself to complete insanity at the end of each university year. Sometimes, while sitting at my computer working endlessly on various papers, I reminded myself that come July, I would be back in the place that I love. Camp is also probably the reason why I am so relaxed about my decision to be a vagabond as of Aug. 13.

I would like to thank you all for following my column over the past two years. I have loved this experience, especially when I received your e-mails and thoughts. I have not finished writing about "Jewish singles issues," but hopefully sometime soon I will be able to share more on that.

Welcome to Joanna Grossman who will be taking over this column! I hope you enjoy it as much as I have.

Good luck to you all and hopefully we will communicate again one day soon.

A farewell from Winnipeg

Who would have thought two years ago that I would be writing my last CJN column at an Internet café in Rome, Italy? Well here I am, sitting at a computer in Europe, thinking back over the last two years and all the experiences I have drawn from to come up with my monthly articles.

Bryan Borzykowski in Winnipeg

Europe provides a plethora of topics that I could write about, but one thing that immediately comes to mind is the word community. More specifically, Jewish community.

In my travels, I have encountered some Jewish communities and Jewish people who have given me an interesting chance to put my community back home in Winnipeg into perspective.

In Paris, I stayed in a hostel in the heart of the Jewish quarter. Kosher restaurants and kids with kippot surrounded me, provided me with a comfort level I usually feel at home or in Israel. In Vernassa, Italy (a very small town in the northern part of the country), a couple saw me donning my Camp Massad shirt and began speaking to me in Hebrew. This couple, originally from Israel, live in the town, which has a total of 10 Jews, but they manage to keep their Judaism alive by keeping Shabbat.

There have also been some negative experiences; for instance, near the Coliseum in Rome, I saw some anti-Semitic graffiti with a message of Holocaust denial, something I have never experienced in Winnipeg.

These situations are just some examples of how small the world is, how there are Jews all over the place, some struggling to keep their identity, others practising Judaism daily. It makes you realize how many of us take our religion for granted and are unaware of the world around us.

This trip also helps me look at my articles from a new perspective. I have been very lucky to have had the opportunity of speaking to Jewish readers across Canada. Like this trip in Europe, which has taught me about various Jewish communities on the other side of the ocean, the purpose of my column was to shed some light onto Winnipeg's Jewish community, provide insight into the life of a Jewish student in Canada and write about topics that provoked and tried to answer burning questions.

Writing for The Canadian Jewish News has been one of the most rewarding endeavours that I have undertaken in my 22 years. I have learned a lot about my own beliefs, and gained insight into my community and the Jewish people at large.

I greatly appreciate the input of all the people who have sent me additional information on a topic or the people who were passionate enough about a topic to let me know that they disagreed with what I had written. I thank the readers who wanted to ask me more, or just wanted to acknowledge that they read my column.

It is very important that there is a forum where Jews can discuss issues with other Jews, and for me, writing for The CJN has given me the opportunity to interact with other readers and learn more about a topic I was interested in.

It is often difficult to see the mainstream media's portrayal of the Middle East conflict, and therefore, it is refreshing to read The CJN and gain a perspective on the subject that I would not otherwise have. Jewish news in Canada (and around the world) can bring all of us closer, keep us unified and provide a place for us to learn and grow.

While my ties to Winnipeg and the Jewish community will never end, I look forward to learning about the new and larger community in Toronto. I will take all of my experiences from Winnipeg and use them to help me wade through the hustle and bustle of Canada's largest city.

I bid all of you adieu. Thanks for reading my column over the last couple of years. I have enjoyed writing and hope to speak to all of you again soon.

The Kirshner File

Muslim world swept up by anti-Semitism

Zacarias Moussaoui, a 34-year-old French national of Moroccan origin, is accused of being a co-conspirator in the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks in the United States. The so-called "20th hijacker" is an archetypical Islamic fundamentalist. Being a radical Islamist, whose proponents hold demonic conspiratorial opinions of Jews, he is no small anti-Semite.

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

The only person facing charges in connection with last year's seminal events in Manhattan, Moussaoui pulls no punches in describing his enemies. In a federal courtroom in Washington, D.C. on April 23, he said, "I pray... for the destruction of the Jewish people and state, and the liberation of Palestine." In a second appearance on June 17, Moussaoui called himself a "slave of Allah," denigrated psychiatry as "an obscene Jewish science" and conceded that he is "openly hostile to the Jews."

As shocking as these statements sound, they are not unusual in Moussaoui's circles.

This strain of anti-Semitism was recently catalogued in an American Jewish Committee report by Hebrew University historian Robert Wistrich. As he put it: "The harsh reality is that, in the year 2002, anti-Semitism has become a major, not a minor, Muslim phenomenon and that many, if not most, of the Muslim leaders in the world today are anti-Semitic."

Radicals like Moussaoui, embittered by the Arab-Israeli conflict and the role of western powers in the Middle East during the colonial and modern eras, are not content with merely lambasting and demonizing Israel.

They knowingly cross the line into outright anti-Semitism.

Shortly after Arab hijackers crashed commercial airliners into the World Trade Center in Manhattan and the Pentagon in Washingtoin, D.C., last September, the Muslim world was consumed by two malicious rumours. The first, suggesting that the Mossad had orchestrated the atrocities, segued into the malevolent lie that Jews who normally work in the World Trade Center had been warned to avoid coming into the office at all costs on that fateful day.

These calumnies, revolting though they are, pale somewhat in comparison to the hateful incitement pouring forth from certain Islamic clerics.

On July 11, the New York Times, in a dispatch from Hamburg, Germany, reported that German police were examining the activities of a preacher who had urged his followers to "slit" the throats of Jews and Christians.

In its April 19 and Feb. 22 editions, the Jewish Chronicle, published in London, England, disclosed that the leader of an extremist Muslim group and a Muslim imam, both residents of Britain, had been charged with stirring up racial hatred by distributing leaflets and tapes calling on Muslims to kill Jews.

It gets worse.

It has been established beyond any reasonable doubt that the recent bombing of a venerable synagogue in Djerba, Tunisia, which claimed the lives of more than a dozen people, including, ironically, 12 German tourists, was the work of al Qaeda, led by the elusive Osama bin Laden.

And in Frankfurt, Germany, an Islamic militant from Algeria named Aeurobui Beandali is now on trial for trying to blow up a synagogue in Strasbourg.

"I admit to plotting to blow up a Jewish synagogue in France," said Beandali, who was arrested 1½ years ago after German police raided his apartment and found an arsenal of guns, grenades, detonators and chemicals for assembling homemade bombs.

If the aforementioned cases chill the blood, consider these facts.

Many recent anti-Semitic incidents in France, including attacks on synagogues, have been perpetrated by Muslims rather than Christians. The sole suspect in the 1993 World Trade Center bombing, Abdul Rahman Yasin, currently residing in Baghdad, Iraq, told 60 Minutes in June that Jewish neighbourhoods in Brooklyn, New York, rather than the twin towers, were his original targets.

And then there is the case of Daniel Pearl, the Wall Street Journal correspondent who was abducted and murdered by Islamic radicals in Pakistan last winter. Fahad Naseem, a suspect in the murder, said that Pearl had been kidnapped because he was Jewish. Before he was killed by his captors, one of whom was recently sentenced to death, Pearl was forced to say, "I am a Jew."

The bitter anti-Semitism prevalent in Muslim societies today has infected intellectual and political echelons.

An example:

On March 10, Al Riyadh, a Saudi Arabian daily newspaper, ran an article by Umayma Ahmed al-Jalahma, an academic at King Faisal University, in which she accused Jews of using the blood of non-Jews to make Purim pastries. Under American pressure, the Saudi government issued an apology.

This vile reiteration of mythical Jewish ritual murder practices was elaborated upon in book form (The Matzoh of Zion) by Syria's defence minister, Mustafa Tlass.

Daniel Pearl

Syria's president, Bashir Assad, had the temerity of greeting Pope John Paul II in Damascus with warmed-over remarks insinuating that Jews had murdered Jesus. And prior to his historic visit to Israel in 1977, the late president of Egypt, Anwar Sadat, claimed that Jewish businessmen were less than honest.

Throughout the Arab world and in Iran, where an Islamic revolution took place in 1979, the infamous Czarist forgery, Protocols of the Elders of Zion, is openly sold. And in its covenant, Hamas, harking back to that 19th century tract, speaks of a diabolical Zionist plot to seize Arab lands.

The Arab and Palestinian media brim with anti-Semitic articles and Nazi-like cartoons, a perpetual source of racial incitement that undermines the idea of Arab-Jewish coexistence. And Arab school texts, even in a moderate country like Jordan, which has a peace treaty with Israel, characterize Jews in the most loathsome terms.

Such texts have been widely circulated. Last winter, the Los Angeles Unified School District seized 300 copies of an English version of the Qu'ran peppered with anti-Jewish references. The books were donated by a Muslim foundation as a "goodwill gesture" following the Sept. 11 attacks.

Holocaust denial is also in vogue in some Muslim quarters. On one Web site (www.fav.net), Palestinian propagandist Ibrahim Alloush writes about "alleged Holocaust lies." He warns that if Palestinians accept "the claims of the Zionists about the 'Holocaust,'" they run the risk of "accepting the rape of Palestine and the legitimacy of the Jewish invasion of Palestine."

The roots of Muslim anti-Semitism, reinforced by western anti-Jewish doctrines, run deep.

Islam regards minorities (dhimmis) like Jews – and Christians – as the People of the Book. They are worthy of tolerance, but as infidels, they are considered inferior. Although the Qu'ran contains positive references about Jews, it is also disdainful of Jews.

In Muslim countries, Jews were traditionally given protection in exchange for the payment of special taxes. But pogroms were not uncommon, and Jews were subjected to a panoply of discriminatory restrictions.

Bernard Lewis, a distinguished Princeton University historian, observes in What Went Wrong?: "In most tests of tolerance, Islam, both in theory and in practice, compares unfavourably with the western democracies as they have developed during the last two or three centuries, but very favourably with most other Christian and post-Christian societies and regimes. There is nothing in Islamic history to compare with the Spanish expulsion of Jews and Muslims [or] the Inquisition."

He might have added that the Holocaust was conceived and implemented by a Christian society.

The struggle for Palestine, Lewis says, greatly facilitated the acceptance of "the anti-Semitic interpretation of history, and led some to blame all evil in the Middle East and indeed in the world on secret Jewish plots. This interpretation has pervaded much of the public discourse in the region, including education, the media and even entertainment."

Islamic fundamentalists, who refer to Jews as the descendants of monkeys and apes, reject Islam's traditional tolerance of dhimmis.

"Like Osama bin Laden, they see Jews and Christians as part of the historic battle or crusade connected with European colonialism and Zionism, and they regard Israel as a Trojan horse of the West, a fifth column [in] Muslim societies," writes John Esposito in Unholy War.

Influenced by reactionary ideologues such as Sayyid Qutb and Ibn Taymiyya, Islamic fundamentalists have expropriated anti-Semitism into their world view and, much to the distress of Muslim liberals, disseminated it throughout the domains of Islam.

Jewish Life

On World Youth Day

By RABBI YEHIEL BEN AYON

A story is told of the saintly Chofetz Chaim. Among his many accomplishments, he was a prolific author. Sorely needed monies for future publishing came from the revenues of his earlier works. The Chofetz Chaim would often then himself go out to sell his own books in order to raise funds for the printing of subsequent volumes.

On one of these trips through the Polish countryside, his wagon passed in front of a well-known roadside religious shrine. It was a given that passing this place meant the wagon driver would make a short stop for some devotion. The Chofetz Chaim was so taken aback that this wagon driver sped right past the shrine instead of making the customary stop or at least crossing himself, that he dismissed the driver and hired another one the first chance he had. Later he explained that he could not trust an individual who showed so little respect for his own faith.

My synagogue is located on Sheppard Avenue, one of the many thoroughfares of Toronto that were closed off to traffic for the recent papal visit and World Youth Days.

As we walked on that early Shabbat morning, it was in a blessed but eerie silence. But at noon, when the services ended, the scene outside the building was altogether different. Confronting us was an endless flow of young people, flags and police escorts marching to the nearby Downsview base, the main site of the event.

At first there was a pause as our eyes met. We looked and examined each other from a distance: the Jews on one side, men in dark suits and hats, women in their Shabbat dresses; the pilgrims on the other side, in shorts, shirts and sandals. I thought it best to break the tension of the moment and I walked over to greet them. Shalom was the quick and surprising response to our hellos. We laughed, shook hands a lot and smiled at each other. Then they broke out into song on the lawn of the synagogue! Apparently, this was an Italian group. I don't know what they were singing, but I did pick up the word pas – peace.

In all, it was a very respectable and even pleasant exchange. Although the whole event had the air of a rock concert, I prefer to see it as some have called it: the spiritual equivalent of Woodstock. Counterculture? Definitely! In the ways of faith, goodness and godliness.

A good thing, I think the Chafetz Chaim would say.

Old news is new again

By ZE'EV GLICENSTEIN

At some point in their lives, nearly everyone in our modern society gets into the newspaper, even if only for a birth, marriage or death announcement. That's why the newly emerging searchable electronic archives of publications like the New York Times, the Toronto Star and the Globe and Mail constitute a giant leap forward for genealogists, historians and other researchers.

Locating a family-related obituary or news story used to require a time-consuming hunt through many reels of microfilm, with no guarantee of success. But thanks to a sophisticated process developed by the Ottawa-based company Cold North Wind, noteworthy items from the past may be pinpointed and retrieved in just seconds.

The Toronto Star database, called Pages of the Past, runs from 1892 to the present and is searchable in increments of up to five years. It is accessible for free through the Toronto Public Library and other library systems, mostly in southern Ontario. I recently spent several hours mining it for family references, and came away amazed at this powerful genealogical tool.

Keying in various names and search terms led me to dozens of references to my large extended family in Toronto from about 1910 forward. Perhaps my most exciting discovery was a 1929 obituary and photograph of my great-grandfather, listing the names of his 13 children. Seeking a branch in our family tree that had seemingly disappeared, I typed in the relatively rare surname; up came several items from the 1930s through the 1970s.

I also found many relevant family names in birth, marriage and death notices, World War II casualty lists, and stories about traffic accidents, court cases, sports competitions, musical performances, high school graduations and charity bake sales. The search engine smartly labels each reference as a news story, birth or death notice, social notice, real estate notice, business story, advertisement and so on.

Since genealogy is about much more than simply documenting names and dates, such items may add colour and detail to a family history. It's up to the genealogist to weigh the ethical and privacy considerations and decide which stories are best left in the past.

Cold North Wind scans each newspaper page from microfilm, then uses an optical character recognition (OCR) program to read every word of text. It has devised new systems of digitization and image quality enhancement to make images much clearer than they were on microfilm. Human beings, not machines, pin a content label on each story.

The Toronto Star Pages of the Past contains more than two million pages in 30,000 editions, according to Stephen Abram, the Toronto-based vice-president of corporate development for Micromedia ProQuest, the large international library reference publisher that handles Cold North Wind products. The archive "takes up two terabytes – it's quite huge," Abram told me.

Micromedia ProQuest also offers a bundling of some 35 Canadian heritage newspapers called the Paper of Record, as well as the New York Times, Chicago Tribune, Wall Street Journal, Washington Post and many other titles. According to Abram, the Globe and Mail will soon be online from 1844 to the present. Primary historical materials such as the diaries of Prime Minister William Lyon Mackenzie King are also being readied to go online, as are more newspapers from the United States, Mexico, England and Australia.

For serious researchers, home subscriptions are available. For details and a demonstration, visit the Web site www.paperofrecord.com.

Conference News: The 22nd IAJGS International Conference on Jewish Genealogy runs Sunday, Aug. 4, through Friday, Aug. 9, at the Sheraton Centre, Toronto. Daily registrations are available. Details at www.jgstoronto2002.ca.

Jewish Life

Chaim Potok (1929-2002)

Books
Bernard Baskin

Lovers of American Jewish literature will mourn the death of Chaim Potok. He was a man of many parts: an ordained Conservative rabbi, best selling author, humanistic professor at the University of Pennsylvania, experienced editor and much sought after lecturer.

He was also a talented painter whose expressionistic works were rich in symbolism. Despite his Orthodox roots, he drew liberally in his novels on the world outlook of many other cultures. Among American Jewish writers he was, perhaps, the major interpreter of the spiritual, emotional and intellectual conflict between traditional Judaism and secularism.

One literary critic wrote that Potok "conjured up a universe of men in dark caftans and fur-trimmed hats; Sabbath dinners awash in candlelight; the sounds of Yiddish in the streets and Hebrew in the synagogues; the wild abandon of a wedding dance; the talmudic explications delivered with knife-edge precision in a neighbourhood shul packed to overflowing."

His best-known novel, The Chosen (1967), introduced a wide audience to the fervent, insular world of chassidic thought and practice. The book was an astonishing success. Jews and non-Jews alike were caught up in the story of a brilliant young Jew, torn between his obligation to become a rabbi and the lure of the wider secular society.

At the height of the novel's popularity I was invited on several occasions to discuss the book with high school students. Today there are a million paperback copies of The Chosen in print.

In My Name is Asher Lev (1990), Potok depicted a gifted artist who wounds his traditional family when he insists on asserting his artistic integrity by painting nudes and interpretations of the Crucifixion.

The dilemma that confronts the author's protagonists, mostly adolescents on the brink of maturity, is one that he faced himself. Should he remain a faithful, unquestioning member of a closed community, or should he seek a broader outlook as a Conservative rabbi and popular author?

He disclosed that "no one can work with the novel and remain inside any fundamentalist sect." He confessed that when he left the confines of the yeshiva, he had to "rebuild my behaviour from zero. To this day there are people from the old world who won't speak to me."

Out of his experience as a chaplain in the United States army in Korea from 1955 to 1957 came The Book of Lights (1981), which deals with the meaning and beauty of Jewish mystical teachings.

His final work, Old Men at Midnight, is a trilogy of related novellas about a woman whose life intersects with the lives of three men of diverse backgrounds. Their life experiences, as related to her, encompass some of the portentous events of our century.

Despite the emotional pain and trauma that Potok's characters undergo, their deeply felt concerns and uncertainties are balanced and softened by his rich portrayal of Jewish family life, his lucid dramatization of Jewish study, piety and ethics, a love of Israel and faith in humankind.

Potok was a gifted and entertaining storyteller who at the same time challenged his readers with Jewish themes to explore and ponder. He will be missed. I joined with many others in reciting Kaddish in his memory.

Back to school resources

The days are still long. And the nights are warm. Even though most kids may not want to admit it, school is just a few weeks away. And as teachers begin to pull out their lesson plans, now is a great time for them to look at the marvelous Jewish educational resources that the Internet has to offer.

Let's start at the beginning, with early childhood education. Amy Weisman is a teacher in South Florida who wasn't able to find suitable Jewish material for her young students on the Web. So she created her own site with resources for teaching youngsters about the holidays, Shabbat, Bible stories and more. [http://www.geocities.com/amynealw/] You can find related material at the Jewish Early Childhood Educators' Electronic Toolkit. [http://www.jesna.org/cgi-bin/earlychild.php3] The Jewish Early Childhood Education Partnership is a research and advocacy group that is trying to sensitize Jewish communities about the importance of early childhood education. [http://www.jecep.org/]

CAJE, The Coalition for the Advancement of Jewish Education, presents a site full of ideas for creating a challenging and meaningful curriculum. You can even watch online video seminars on topics including working with children with special needs, teaching controversial subjects and communicating with parents. I was intrigued by Paul Epstein's lecture on Brainstorming: How to develop five teaching ideas on any topic. [http://www.caje.org/]

If you are trying to teach recent history and current events, you will need resources to supplement even the most current textbook. From Matzah to Matzav: The Current Crisis in Israel deals with such topics as The United Nations and Israel and Worldwide Anti-Semitism in the Wake of 9/11. [http://www.caje.org/learn/israel_curriculum. htm]

JESNA, the Jewish Education Service of North America, focuses on promoting excellence in education. JESNA has studied issues such as Jewish Day School Viability and offers complete reports online. The JESNA Directory of Central Agencies for Jewish Education supplies information about Boards of Jewish Education throughout North America. One helpful feature groups North American educators by specialty so you find experts in such areas as adult education, Holocaust studies or music and art. [http://www.jesna.org/].

Is your school looking for Israeli teachers who could come teach for two to four years? Then check out the Jewish Agency's Department for Jewish Zionist Education Shlichut Program. [http://www.jajz-ed.org.il/dept/shlichim/] Another program offered by the department called Let's Twin matches students in schools in Israel and the Diaspora and helps them start a dialogue. You can find more about the department's programs at its huge Web site. [http://www.jajz-ed.org.il/cen2.html]

There are many more excellent Jewish educational resources on the Web, including the Academic Jewish Studies Internet [http://jewish-studies.virtualave.net/], and sites created by the Department for Jewish-Zionist Education, [http://www.jajz-ed.org.il/diaspora/links/], the Union of American Hebrew Congregations. [http://www.uahc.org/learning/] and the Toronto Board of Jewish Education. [http://www.bjetoronto.org/link.weblinks.a.html] One of the most impressive initiatives belongs to the Jewish Education Center of Cleveland which has created Virtual Field Trips. These trips promote Internet literacy while teaching about institutions like the United States Holocaust Memorial Museum. [http://www.jecc.org/edres/medtech/vft/stage.htm]

If you are a Jewish educator who would like to hone your teaching skills, then consider going back to school. The Melton Centre for Jewish Education at Jerusalem's Hebrew University offers a one-year Senior Educators' Program for teachers with three years full-time experience in Jewish Education. The centre also operates over 60 "Mini-Schools" worldwide for teachers and other adults who are interested in structured Jewish learning. [http://sites.huji.ac.il/melton/top.html]

And from Ramat Gan, the Lookstein Center for Jewish Education in the Diaspora also provides both lesson plans and courses at Bar Ilan University. There are programs geared toward school principals from abroad and for teachers interested in curriculum and professional development. [http://www.lookstein.org/home.htm]

Next week, more of the best Web sites for teachers, including Jewish music, clip art, quizzes and games.

Israeli citizens say thanks to young leaders

Twenty-one Canadians take part in UJC mission

By ANDREA RITTER

On the evening of June 30, our group of 21 young leaders from London, Montreal, Ottawa and Toronto boarded a packed El Al flight out of Pearson International Airport, filled with the anticipation of joining our American counterparts for a week-long United Jewish Communities (UJC) mission in Israel.

Thankfully, most of our friends and family were overwhelmingly supportive when we announced our intention to make this trip at perhaps the most trying time in the young life of our homeland. We felt confident. We needed to go. Israel needed us.

Guest Voice

We arrived at Ben-Gurion Airport late the following afternoon, Canada Day. Proudly donning our baseball caps emblazoned with Israeli and Canadian flags, we gathered our bags and headed to the Tel Aviv Marriott to join the other 109 participants from Boston, Detroit, Los Angeles, Miami, New York and surrounding areas. Few of us knew each other well that first evening as we dined by the beach, the sun sinking into the Mediterranean behind us. Within a week, this feeling would change dramatically.

We set out early the next morning for our first stop: the Park Hotel in Netanya. We filed out of the three buses in which would spend so much of our time and into the lobby, brimming with the chatter of new friends getting acquainted.

But as we entered the banquet hall where 29 innocent seder participants had been killed just months before, our 130 voices fell immediately silent. Only the click of our cameras punctuated the quiet as we circled the room, taking in a scene to which CNN imagery could never do justice. The room had been tidied and scrubbed, but shattered mirrors and crumpled chandeliers remained to tell their tale. Together we lit candles and said Kaddish, many of us gazing up tearfully at a dinner knife still lodged in the charred concrete ceiling.

What we saw set the tone for an intense journey through the north. Our group went on to hear from volunteers with the Israel Crisis Management Centre, an organization that has been invaluable in helping the nation's immigrant population cope with heavy losses in the wake of recent terror attacks. We visited the seam line, where Israeli settlements lie adjacent to Palestinian-controlled villages along the country's narrowest strip. We learned of the challenges in guarding the security of these picturesque Israeli towns encircled by barbed wire, electrified fences and concrete barriers designed to deter infiltrators and deflect snipers' bullets. We were awed by the perseverance of our own people who live with this reality day in and day out.

Twenty-one UJC mission participants from London, Montreal, Ottawa and Toronto stand before a newly arrived armored ambulance, a gift from Canadian Jewish philanthropists, at the Tel Aviv headquarters of Magen David Adom.

Yet, as our buses rolled along the modern, multi-lane highways from site to site on our packed itinerary, the scenery seemed almost shockingly peaceful. Thick groves of olive, palm, and banana. Endless fields lush with vegetables and melons. Climbing shrubs and vines bursting with magenta and crimson flowers. We were reminded that the intense beauty of this land remains indifferent to the violence and strife trumpeted almost daily by our headlines back home. Over the next days, the incredible sights of the Galilee, the Kineret and the Golan Heights sparked our appreciation for the magnificence of Eretz Yisrael, too often overshadowed by tragedy and fear.

Led by our expert guides, we toured richly historic sites, including King Solomon's fortress at Megiddo, Gamla, known as the Masada of the Golan, and the Golan Heights, where one can stand on Israeli soil and view Lebanon, Syria and Jordan all at once. We enjoyed a sun-filled afternoon of rafting on the Jordan River and a beautiful twilight boat cruise on the Kineret. We spent our shekels at the small boutiques and galleries in the mystical city of Safed where the scarcity of tourists has been sorely felt this year. We danced and sang together at evening parties and on our buses. And each day, our friendships and our passion for where we were and why we were there grew stronger.

Our bonds with Israel were further reinforced through opportunities to make some of our own small contributions in return. We volunteered at two absorption centres in Tiberias, where olim from Ethiopia and Argentina begin new lives as Israeli citizens. In the end, just talking with these new immigrants, listening to their worries and their dreams for a better life, seemed to outweigh the significance of the painting and gardening we did there.

Later, during our visit to the Tel Aviv headquarters of Magen David Adom, many of us lined up to give blood. Our small group from Canada was especially honoured to be present for the arrival of a brand new armoured ambulance, a gift from Canadian Jewish philanthropists.

The mood was perfect for the last leg of our journey: Jerusalem. Upon our arrival, we headed straight to Mount Scopus to say Shehechiyanu and drink a toast overlooking the city of gold.

We kept up our hectic schedule on these final days of our mission. At Hadassah Hospital, we met victims of brutal terror attacks recovering under the expert care of incredible physicians. We also enjoyed a rare, first-hand account of events in Jenin from Dr. David Zangen, one of the IDF's chief medical officers, who amazed us with his compassion and respect for all human life. We had just enough time for some shopping in the Old City before a tranquil Kabalat Shabbat celebration at the Kotel, a spot that was heartbreakingly empty for July. Still, watching the sun dip into the glowing hills of Yerushalayim was breathtaking.

When Shabbat ended the next day, so did our mission. Many from our group stayed on to enjoy some relaxation after the hectic trip was over. The rest of us packed our bags and headed back to the airport after a heartfelt Havdallah service and tearful goodbyes among new close friends. We had taken in so much together. It felt so much longer than one week, and yet we wanted more. We had no choice but to package our energy and enthusiasm and bring it back home to our friends and family, to encourage them to make the trip we had made. Some of us are already planning reunions with our fellow travellers.

Looking back, I think perhaps the most stunning aspect of our trip was the number of Israeli citizens – shopkeepers, artists, doctors, kibbutzniks, new immigrants, and even military personnel – who thanked us for being there. They told us we were brave for coming.

Imagine that.

Perhaps we were naively fearless. Hopefully we will all be back soon. Am Yisrael chai.

Na'amat member leaves bulk of estate to Labour Zionist causes

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

When Larry Lichtenstein died in 1950 at age 18, his parents Israel and Brucha, were determined to channel their grief in a positive direction.

As longtime Labour Zionists, they decided to have a health clinic built in Kfar Saba, Israel in memory of their only child.

About 13,000 patients a year, including about 5,000 adolescents and children, now come to the the 50-year-old Lichtenstein Clinic to see physicians, psychologists, social workers and other specialists.

The couple's relationship to the clinic, however, did not end with its establishment. When Brucha died last year at age 94, 20 years after her husband, she bequeathed $750,000 to the Canadian Association for Labour Israel, an organization that raises funds for hospital and clinics in Israel.

Gert Weinberg, executive director of the association, said that Lichtenstein, a "lover of Yiddish" and a member of Na'amat for more than 70 years, also left $100,000 to Bialik Hebrew Day School to ensure the continuation of its Yiddish program, and $300,000 to Na'amat, which will be used to build an addition to its technical school in Haifa.

The money for the Lichtenstein Clinic will be used to build a second floor, install an elevator, enlarge the pharmacy, add treatment rooms and refurbish the existing building, Weinberg said.

"We know this is something she would have wanted to do. The Lichtensteins built the clinic, because after Larry died a painful death from bone cancer, they wanted money to go to health care. Our renovation is very appropriate.

"When staff at the clinic heard our news, they were elated. They were running out of space."

Lorraine Levene, executive director of Na'amat Canada, Toronto, said that because Larry was a teenager when he died, her organization decided to use its bequest to refurbish the Na'amat Technical High School and rename it the Na'amat Lichtenstein Technical High School.

The school, which now has about 270 students, offers co-op training in such fields as early childhood education, hair design and photography.

The addition to the school will include a library and more classrooms, which means it can accept more students, said Levene.

She said Lichtenstein is the first person she is aware of to leave such a large portion of her estate solely to Labour Zionist organizations.

"She was a unique person. She demonstrated that life must go on after a tragedy. Dedicating herself to worthy causes was a way of honouring her son," said Levene.

ארץ ישראל- קיץ 2002

אני חייב להגיד שכל זה שימח אותי מאד, כי זה סימן לחוק פנימי וזו התשובה חכי ניצחת לאנטישמים הפלאסטינאיים ולאנטישמים באירופה וגם לאלה שכאן.

איני חיפאי, ועל כן טבעי שאיזני שוחה שם בביקורי בארץ, אז היזנה הפעם יצא לי לשהות במלון דן כרמל ארבעה ימים מול חנוף חנפלא של העיר חיפה הזו. בחעדר מוחלט של תיירים, היו במלון כשלושים איש, ואלוחים יודע כמה זמן חם יוכלו לשאוד בחפסדים כאלה.

פגשתי שם ארץ ישראל אחרת מזו של תל אביב- מנמסת, מסבירת פנים, מחייכת, פשוט תענוג! בחנות חמכולת נתנת לי עדף קופאית צעירה, שעל פי חמבטא שלה היא ערביה במחצאה ואמרת לי "יום טוב". לא עוד "שיהיה לך יום טוב" (ענו תרגום מאנגלית) אלא פשוט וקצר- "יום טוב". אחר כך אשמע את חברכה חזו פעמים רבות, והיא תעשה לי באמת יום טוב.

קריסטי בָלֵב'פורד, כתבת חנשיונל פוסט בילחה ערב שבת עם משפחתו חאבלה של דויד רזנצוויג שנרצח על ידי אנטישמי מטורף. אם לא קראתם את העיתון חזה עד היום- היזנה עוד סיבה להתחיל ולחרגיש בביתי. אני מביא לכם ציטוט קטן מהכתבה חנפלאה חזו שנקראת "חבית שבו דויד רזנצוויג חי" ("חי" בלשון חווה ולא בזמן עבר)

"יום אחד בשבוע שעבר, חבן חצעיר, ילד מקסים בן שמונה עם רווח בשיניים, שאל את אימו: מה את חושבת יותר קשה- לאשה לאבד בעל, או לילד לאבד אבא? שאלה אותו חאמא מה דעתו, ועל כך ענה לה חילד שהוא חושב שיותר קשה לאבד אבא. ואז הוא הוסיף: "לפעמים אני חושב שזה טריק שמישהו עושה לנו, ושאבא פתאום יכנס בדלת....."

ואחיו בן חשנים עשרה אמר לאימו:

" יש משפחות, שכשקורה להן אסון כזה- הן מתרסקות...אנחנו צריכים להיות מאוד מאוד זהירים"...

הכתבה חביאה לְתודעה משפחה מופלאה, עם חרבה אהבת אדם, חום ואכפתיות. דרך חעצב חעמוק שחשתי, חרגשתי גם נאוות חזקה על שיש אצלנו ערכים כאלה, על שהתרבות וחמסורת היהודית שָמה את חמשפחה במקום ראשון. לא פגשתי את דויד רזנצוויג בחיין, אבל אני נאה בו ובמשפחתו ומרגיש שהוא מחזק אותי.

U of Toronto scholar reassesses Agnon's oeuvre

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

A succession of scholars has pored over and analyzed the works of Shmuel Yosef Agnon, the first and so far only Hebrew writer to receive a Nobel Prize for literature.

Sharon Green, a Hebrew literature specialist at the University of Toronto, is the latest academic who has appraised Agnon's body of work, which includes The Bridal Canopy and A Guest for the Night.

Now she has written Not a Simple Story: Love and Politics in a Modern Hebrew Novel, in which she presents Agnon – the 1966 Nobel laureate – in a new light.

Sharon Green

Green portrays him as an artist cum thinker whose novels and short stories display a profound understanding of the social and political crisis at the heart of modern Jewish life.

Agnon (1888-1970), she argues, was essentially a Jewish nationalist and secular modernist whose critical portrait of Jewish life sought to hold Jews to a higher standard.

Today, in her estimation, Agnon is increasingly viewed through the lens of various fads, ranging from psycholoanalytic theory to gender politics.

"This is a strange irony, because when Agnon first began his literary career, he was seen essentially as a religious writer, and was criticized by some of his contemporaries for being overly sympathetic to an 'outmoded' way of life," Green says.

She contends that these conceptions of Agnon are basically flawed and thus fall short of an understanding of his place in the pantheon of Israeli literature.

"The uniqueness of Agnon is that he was able to capture the richness of traditional Jewish life, while at the same time he was absolutely clear-sighted about the dangers such a life holds for Jewish survival in modern times," Green observes.

"Agnon's literary genius is contained in his ability to hold in creative tension the Jewish religious tradition and the secular modern world, both of which he shows to be needed for Jews to thrive. The dialectical tension in his work is probably the reason why many readers find his works enigmatic."

Green, whose PhD dissertation turned on the problem of love in Agnon's work, was drawn to him as an undergraduate at Brandeis University in Waltham, Mass.

"I found his works had a kind of profundity not often found in contemporary literature," she explains. "Although there are certainly other Hebrew writers of great virtuosity and power, they are all like heirs of Agnon.

"He is much like Shakespeare is to English literature. And like Shakespeare, he needs to be studied rather then read quickly for pleasure. Like most great art, it is worth the effort."

Citing Amos Oz's recent book about Agnon, Green believes Agnon's reputation has grown since his death.

Apart from Agnon, Green is also particularly interested in Isaac Bashevis Singer – the sole Nobel laureate in Yiddish literature.

"Singer is a master storyteller, and he deserves credit for helping bring Yiddish literature to the English-speaking world," observes Green, who wrote an essay about him in a reference book entitled The Encyclopedia of the Novel.

Her interest in Yiddish novelists is anything but coincidental.

"The study of Yiddish literature is absolutely essential for the understanding of modern Hebrew literature, and vice versa," notes Green, whose essay on the topic was published in a reference book called The Golden Age of Yiddish Literature: From the Late Nineteenth Century Until the Outbreak of World War II.

Hebrew and Yiddish literature are inextricably connected. As she puts it: "Most of the writers were at ease in both languages, and many of them published in both as well. For example, many of Agnon's earliest works were in Yiddish, while Isaac Leib Peretz's youthful writings were in Hebrew."

Green, who has been associated with U of T for the past 14 years, has also delved into modern Hebrew poetry.

Asked to assess the state of the genre and the poets she rates most highly, she replies, "I think the poetry of Yehuda Amichai is truly outstanding. Like Agnon in prose, he manages in his verse to convey a deep awareness of ancient Jewish sources, while at the same time capturing the cadences and sensibility of Israeli life."

Currently, Green is writing a book about the continuity and transformation of religious ideas in secular Hebrew poetry.

"Despite the common impression of Hebrew poetry being a completely secular pursuit, I'm intrigued by the fact that there is so much religious content in ostensibly secular verse. Why is it there, and what does it indicate about modern Jewish life? These are a few of the questions I hope to answer in this book."

In addition to Amichai, Green will include the following poets in her forthcoming book: Avraham Shlonsky, Leah Goldberg, Yocheved Bat-Miriam, Amir Gilboa, Abba Kovner, Dan Pagis, Natah Zach, Dalia Ravikovich and Yona Wallach.

Recently, she finished an essay on Chaim Brandwein, a professor of Hebrew literature at Brandeis with whom she studied. It will appear in a volume of essays to be published by Tel Aviv University Press this year.

"He was also a very talented Hebrew poet and short story writer," she says. "My essay is about one of his most vibrant stories, whose theme is the moral tension between religious tradition and secular modernity in Israel."

Green teaches in the department of Near and Middle Eastern Civilizations. In September, she will teach a new, full-year course on modern Hebrew literature in English translation. It will be open to all students without prerequisites.

She was born and raised in Toronto. Her parents, Paul and Bess Mintz, were civil servants.

Her husband, Kenneth Hart Green, is an associate professor of modern Jewish philosophy at the University of Toronto.

They have three sons, Alexander, 17, Daniel, 13, and Jonathan, 10.

Manitoba's Sidney Spivak remembered as a gentleman

By MYRON LOVE
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — With the passing of Sidney Spivak last month, the Jewish community here lost a political and community leader who won praise from friend and foe alike for always being a gentleman.

Spivak died at age of 74 from complications related to heart surgery.

He learned the value of community work from his parents, community leaders Rose and Malick. An outstanding student, he earned a Master of Laws degree from Harvard University, after which he returned to Winnipeg to pursue careers in law, business and politics.

Spivak was a lifelong Progressive Conservative. He was first elected to the Manitoba Legislature in 1966 and very quickly found a place around premier Duff Roblin's cabinet table.

He served in senior portfolios under Roblin's short-lived successor, Walter Weir. After the Weir government was defeated in 1969 by the New Democratic Party, Spivak was elected to succeed Weir as leader of the Conservatives in 1971, becoming the first Jewish leader of a major political party in the history of Manitoba. (A short time later, Izzy Asper became leader of the Manitoba Liberal Party, leaving Manitoba with two Jewish opposition party leaders in the legislature; the NDP government also had three senior Jewish cabinet ministers.)

While Spivak was able to improve on the Tories' electoral results in the 1973 election, he was not able to unseat popular NDP premier Ed Schreyer. After two more years as leader of the Opposition, he was unceremoniously ousted as party leader by Sterling Lyon.

Nonetheless, he served in Lyon's cabinet after Lyon won the 1977 election.

In 1979, Spivak quit provincial politics to run for federal Parliament. He lost to Lloyd Axworthy and walked away from the political arena to devote his energies to business ventures and community causes.

In his eulogy, Spivak's son, Harold, said his father "loved the game of politics and knew how to play it without rancour or personal animosity. He thoroughly enjoyed the intrigue, the strategizing and the intellectual battle."

While there were those who argued that Spivak may have won the 1973 election if he had not have been Jewish, others attribute his loss to Schreyer's popularity at the time. Within the Tory party itself, observers have noted that Spivak's major difficulty was not so much his religious background as that he was an urban "progressive" leader in a caucus composed mainly of "conservative" rural members.

A lifelong Zionist, Spivak served in the late 1980s and early 1990s as chairman of the Canada-Israel Committee. In the Jewish community he also held leadership roles with the Jewish National Fund, B'nai Brith, Canadian Associates of Ben-Gurion University, Canadian Friends of Bar Ilan University and the Canadian Council of Christians and Jews. In the wider community, he served as a board member of, and raised money for, a variety of cultural, educational and medical institutions.

Spivak is survived by his wife of 47 years, Senator Mira Spivak, and their three children.

Speaking for the family, Harold Spivak said: "Our father always seemed larger than life, like a fictional hero. He was a man of great achievement who generated so much warmth and love. Yet his greatest influence on us comes not from witnessing his public successes but from the strength of his personal qualities, his warmth and generosity, kindness and compassion, his humility and self-effacing nature, his great resilience and grace under pressure and his capacity to weather the ebbs and flows of life with a boundless sense of optimism and hopefulness."

Israeli press criticizes IDF's Gaza operation

According to Reports

By PAUL MICHAELS

Approximately two weeks have passed since the Israel Defence Forces dropped a one-ton bomb on Hamas leader Saleh Shehadeh's Gaza hideout. The bomb killed Shehadeh and his associate but also, tragically, 14 Palestinian civilians, nine of them children.

International media reports and commentary continue to heap criticism on Israel for the attack. While the coverage does not blame Israel for Shehadeh's death, noting that he was responsible for the murder of as many as 200 Israelis, it chastises Israel for the large number of civilians killed and injured, and the high proportion of children.

Israeli and Diaspora Jews alike, intensely self-critical, immediately expressed sorrow over the civilian casualties. Interestingly, much of Israeli editorial comment, including the conservative Jerusalem Post, was as critical of the Gaza operation, and in some cases more so, than the major Canadian newspapers.

The Toronto Star's "No path to peace," (July 24) and the Globe and Mail's "Death and rage in Gaza" (July 25), illustrate this. While condemning the operation, both acknowledged Shehadeh's bloody record and Palestinian Authority President Yasser Arafat's failure to control Shehadeh as required under the Oslo accords.

The Globe, calling Israel's action a "reckless" crossing of the "red line that divides self-defence from overkill," went on to observe the following: "There is no good reason to believe anything said by Hamas, whose stated aim is the obliteration of Israel. Nor is there any cause to mourn the death of Mr. Shehadeh, a mass murderer responsible for scores, perhaps hundreds of Israeli deaths... Mr. Shehadeh was a legitimate target who knew he was a public enemy number one, yet chose to place his family, and everybody else in the vicinity directly in harm's way. Nor can Yasser Arafat's Palestinian Authority entirely escape blame for Monday's slaughter." Still, the paper went on to note that "None of this excuses the pitiless ferocity of the Israeli assault."

John Podhoretz, writing in the New York Post (reprinted in the Ottawa Citizen) "Hamas kills its own" (July 29), made many of the same points as the Globe, but concluded that according to international law, by placing himself among civilians to be used "as human shields," Shehadeh himself bears direct responsibility for the tragedy.

Interestingly, most Israeli analysts do not go this far. The Israeli press was particularly critical of the military breakdown leading to the tragic deaths of Palestinian civilians. The Jerusalem Post was critical of the operation, asking "What was the military thinking?" It appears the Israeli media prefer to emphasize the ongoing need to avoid harming innocent civilians – as witnessed in its Jenin operation in April. It must exercise this caution, even as it pursues, as it must, the perpetrators of terrorist attacks.

Editor's note: This column was written before the July 31 bombing in Jerusalem at Hebrew University that killed seven people and injured more than 80.

Barrie Jewish community prepares to build first shul

By ADAM GRACHNIK
CJN Intern

BARRIE, Ont. — For Torontonians, this town along Highway 400 is normally just a place to grab a quick bite or fill up along the trek north to cottage country. Yet over the past decade, the Jewish population in Barrie has boomed, creating a community set to build their first shul.

Around 65 families regularly call Barrie home and their numbers swell to over 200 in the summer as an influx of cottagers populate the region 100 kilometres north of Toronto.

While there has been Jewish life in Barrie for 100 years, Jewish migration in large numbers didn't occur until the early '70s. Each decade since has brought a new wave of Jews, with the community growing more than 600 per cent from just under 10 families in 1973. The city itself has also undergone tremendous growth, skyrocketing from 26,000 people to today's total of 115,000 in just 30 years.

With a Torah donated a few years ago from the B'nai Tikvah Congregation in Niagara Falls and $750,000 raised, the Am Shalom congregation (formerly the Simcoe County Jewish Association) will soon begin construction on a 10,000-square-foot building on a piece of land donated by developer and former Barrie resident Henry Bernick.

"It is now the next stage of the community's growth," said Eric Allen, fund-raising director for the shul. "When the synagogue gets built, it will just be a magnet for people."

The concept of the shul building, which will have a library, community hall and Hebrew school, was designed for free by Toronto architect Cliff Korman.

Residents of the local Jewish community have pledged and donated $300,000. As well, Allen said, many non-Jewish residents in Barrie have felt compelled to support the shul because they realize how important it is.

Yet, it's the summer cottagers who populate the Lake Couchiching and Lake Simcoe region who have made the congregation's dream a reality, pledging an additional $450,000.

"The synagogue wouldn't exist without the cottagers' contributions," Allen said.

According to Allen, the shul will be open for service in the fall of 2003. The congregation still has a goal of raising $1 million.

Over the years, Barrie has been transformed from a cottagers' haven to a year-round home for Jewish families. People like the congregation's former president Marshall Green, who was looking for a change from Toronto, moved to Barrie to start a new life in 1973.

"[It was a] good opportunity to try something different," said Green, who moved to Barrie to article at a local law firm and found his first neighbour to be the local Anglican minister.

"Very few people had any experience with Jews," he said. "It was enjoyable to become a kind of teacher. It was very refreshing to be asked about my faith."

Community has become important to the former Torontonian, who said that practising Judaism wasn't as important to him when he was growing up in a Jewish milieu as it is now.

"[The] main thing about living in a small town is the effort and responsibility it takes to be Jewish," Green said.

Am Shalom has become a member of the North American Reform organization Union of American Hebrew Congregations (UAHC), with Rabbi Bernard Baskin leading the services for the past 13 years. Barrie is one of 27 small Jewish communities linked together by the Regional Jewish Communities of Ontario (RJCO) under the banner of the United Israel Appeal.

"For many many years, our community felt ignored," Green said. "The RJCO has done an amazing job at recognizing that there is a Jewish life outside of Toronto."

Of the 27 communities, Barrie is one of the few increasing in population.

"Our situation is unique. We're an hour to Toronto and all those cottagers," said Green, adding that "location, location, location" is a key reason for Barrie's success.

"They [Barrie] are experiencing the most growth and are definitely the youngest community," said Michael Soberman, director of community development for the RJCO. "Their proximity to Toronto offers a good compromise for people who want to live in a less urban place."

Jewish community leaders Marshall Green (left), Dr Gerald Levine (middle) and Eric Allen are part of the Am Shalom congregation in Barrie . In four separate waves the number of Jews has increased almost 600 percent since the 70's.

Green said when he arrived, he found few Jews, and most had intermarried. Even today, 60 per cent of the community is intermarried.

Before the '70s, he said, the community was very small and while they had a Hebrew school, they did not have a synagogue. According to Green, many of the kids grew up, went away to university and never came back. When he and his wife arrived, he said the community was "much older" than it is today.

In the '80s, a second wave of Jews moved to Barrie and the community grew to 25 families. Services began in rented halls, community centres and people's homes, and the community established itself as the York Simcoe Jewish Association.

Among the newcomers was Dr. Gerald Levine, the current president of Am Shalom. Levine, who grew up in North York, moved with his wife Elizabeth in 1985 because he "thought it would be a good place to start a medical practice." He said when he arrived, he did not know anybody and the Jewish community found him.

"I was working when I got a call from another doctor, asking me if I was Jewish," Levine said. "The other doctor told me to hustle [to someone's house], because they needed me for a minyan at a High Holiday service."

Allen moved to town in 1992, because he was simply "looking to settle outside of Toronto," and "Barrie [was] far enough away that it's a separate community.

"I didn't give much thought to a Jewish community. I wasn't expecting much from it," he said, adding that he was pleasantly surprised to find it very well-established.

With the new shul, the community is anticipating even more members.

"We get a call or two a week from people moving up," said Green.

However, as the population explodes, fears arise that the traditional family feel might disappear.

"[It's] unrealistic to say we're not going to change. [We] have to become more business-like," said Green. Allen added that they have been pretty lenient about things such as membership fees in the past.

Young families who first flocked here now have grown children who were born and raised in Barrie. But the youth seem to be going against the population trend and moving out.

"I'm probably not going to stay," said Levine's son Adam, who in the fall will enter Grade 12 at Barrie Central Collegiate, where there are five other Jewish students. "It's a great town to grow up in. But I want to do other things. I want to grow up and explore."

Green's daughter, Cesia, 22, is currently studying at Queen's University and also has no plans to return. She said she has lost touch with the few Jews she knew while growing up.

"There isn't a whole lot for me anymore," said the younger Green, who just spent the year studying in Holland. "Even Kingston has more. I've kind of grown outside of Barrie. I know my brother [who is currently in Chicago] isn't coming back and I would be very surprised if my sister [who is studying at University of Toronto] came back."

Adam Levine said he has grown up with some other young Jewish people and he has made at least four or five very close Jewish friends. But he said he "thinks they will be heading out as well. They want to do other things. I don't have the feeling that they want to stay."

He added that he may come back when he is older, and that he believes the community will survive because it welcomes many new young families.

Maybe the youths don't know what they are missing out on, because their parents agreed that it is mainly the lifestyle in Barrie that keeps them here.

Gerald Levine said he makes just as much money as a Toronto doctor, but doesn't have to fight traffic. He added he is right near the most beautiful spots in cottage country and enjoys the outdoor life and doesn't have to work as hard.

Marshall Green said he "doesn't make as much money [as a lawyer], but you measure it against the lifestyle and you can't complain."

"It's a great community," said Allen. "I couldn't see living anywhere else."

The Am Shalom congregation is always looking for members and for people to get involved in the new shul. If interested, please call 705-721-6126.

New cookbook helps beginners master Jewish food

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

In his new cookbook, The Mensch Chef, (Clarkson Potter Publishers) Mitchell Davis has set out to prove that the most beginner of beginning cooks can prepare traditional Jewish food.

Recipes for classics such as cholent, potato latkes, basic brisket, and carrot and sweet potato tzimmes are written clearly and simply, and Davis assumes that cooks are making each recipe for the first time.

Davis, originally from Toronto, is a graduate of Cornell University's school of hotel administration. He has worked as a chef in France and Italy, and is currently a professor in New York University's food studies program.

His book, he says, is a primer of the "iconic Jewish foods you dream of – foods of your childhood, presuming your childhood was spent, like mine, in a North American Jewish enclave surrounded by Ashkenazim.

"It's an Ashkenazi ABC; it's a book for the first time you host a Passover seder and don't know what to serve, or a book to help you satisfy your craving for cabbage borscht, chicken soup and matzah balls, kasha varnishkes or gefilte fish."

For the true beginner, Davis gives a recipe's kosher status – for example, pareve, but if you add butter instead of margarine, dairy – and with most recipes, he answers the questions that he anticipates an inexperienced cook would ask. He also provides a background to the dish.

"Tzimmes is both a dish and a Yiddish word that means a little bit of everything all mixed up together, in short, a mess," he writes.

In a "bissel advice" about tzimmes (all the recipes contain little sidebars with these aptly named helpful tips), he says that the dish can be assembled, covered and refrigerated in advance, but he advises that you bake it the day you serve it. "Because the vegetables are very well cooked, I wouldn't advise cooking it days in advance; once you reheat it, the tzimmes turns to mush."

He admits the blintz recipe looks like a lot of work, but "it reads like more of a production than it is. It's just that writing down all of the steps sort of takes up more room than just doing them."

Sprinkled throughout the book are Davis's personal recollections. We learn about his mother's latkes, his grandmother's farfel and his family's favourite roast beef and roast chicken recipes (which follow).

BASIC BRISKET

3 large onions, coarsely chopped
2 large garlic cloves, smashed
2 large carrots diced, optional
6 oz. mushrooms, chopped
1 5-7 lb. brisket, trimmed of fat
1 tbsp. kosher salt
1 tsp. freshly ground black pepper
1 tsp. granulated garlic
1 tsp. Hungarian paprika
6 oz. can tomato paste
1 bay leaf

Special Equipment: Large roasting pan with a tight-fitting cover or aluminum foil

Preheat oven to 350. Place chopped onions, smashed garlic, carrots, and mushrooms in the bottom of the roasting pan. Place the brisket fat side down on top of the vegetables. Sprinkle half the salt, pepper, granulated garlic, and paprika on the brisket. Turn it over and sprinkle with the remaining half of the spices. Spread the tomato paste all over the top of the brisket. Fill the can with water and pour it into the pan. Add the bay leaf, cover, and set in the preheated oven.

After two hours of cooking, remove the brisket from oven, let cool slightly and transfer to a cutting board. Now you can trim away the fat. Slice the brisket less than ¼ inch thick on the diagonal across the grain. Return the slices to the cooking juice. Once all of the brisket is sliced, recover the roasting pan and return to the oven for another 1½ to 2 hours or until meat is easily cut with fork. Remove from oven and cool to room temperature in gravy. Makes 10 to 15 servings with plenty of leftovers.

A bissel advice: Store the brisket in the gravy in the refrigerator for up to five days or freeze. Reheat covered in a 325-degree oven for 30 to 45 minutes, or until heated through.

ROAST CHICKEN

2 large onions chopped
1 large garlic clover, minced
4½ lb. roasting chicken
1 tsp. kosher salt
½ tsp granulated garlic
½ tsp. freshly ground black pepper
½ tsp. ground paprika
5 medium Yukon gold potatoes peeled and cut into 2-inch chunks

Special Equipment: roasting pan with tight-fitting lid or heavy-duty aluminum foil

Preheat oven to 350. Place onions and minced garlic in the bottom of the roasting pan. Set chicken breast side up on onions. Sprinkle ½ tsp. salt, ¼ tsp. granulated garlic, ¼ tsp. black pepper and ¼ tsp. paprika on chicken and in cavity. Turn it breast side down and sprinkle with remaining spices. Cover chicken and set in oven for one hour.

Remove the cover or foil and scatter the potatoes in the onions and cooking juice around the base of the chicken. Raise the oven temperature to 400 and continue roasting until the skin begins to brown, 15 to 25 minutes. Using two large forks or a pair of tongs, turn the chicken over so the breast is facing up. Continue to roast for an additional 30 minutes, until the skin has browned and crisped. The potatoes should be fork tender. Remove from oven and let cool for about 10 minutes before cutting up chicken to serve.

A bissel advice: The easiest way to cut up a chicken is to use a pair of sharp poultry shears or kitchen scissors. Do it in the roasting pan to avoid a mess on the counter.

Position the pan so you are looking at the rear end of the chicken. Use the shears to cut through the centre of the breast, starting at the cavity and ending at the neck. This will expose the backbone, which is the ridge in the middle of the bottom of the cavity.

Cut along both sides of the backbone to separate the chicken into two halves. Place one half on a plate. Snip the leg off the thigh at the joint. You should be able to separate the thigh from the breast just by pulling it. Remove the wing the same way you removed the leg, at the joint. Cut the breast in half to produce two equal portions. Repeat this process with the remaining half chicken. You should end up with 10 pieces.

REALLY HIGH HOLIDAYS

Queen's opens J.B. Salsberg Papers to the public

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

History students doing scholarly research and individuals interested in the labour movement and Jewish history in Canada can now, for the first time, study the J.B. Salsberg Papers.

The permanent collection, part of the Queen's University Archives, was opened to the general public last month.

It consists of extensive correspondence, speeches, reports, photographs, clippings, sound recordings and moving images, as well as other materials pertaining to the late labour organizer, politician, journalist and activist.

Notably, through an extensive number of taped interviews that span the decades, researchers will be able to hear Salsberg discuss his beliefs and attitudes.

The materials, which cover the period from 1913 to 1996, are located in Kathleen Ryan Hall on the Kingston campus. A description of the papers and other materials will also be available online through the Queen's Archives database and through the Canadian Archival Information Network.

Salsberg's niece, Sharyn Salsberg Ezrin, said that in 1999, the executors of Salsberg's estate granted exclusive use of the collection for two years to Gerald Tulchinsky, a Queen's history professor, and Adam Fuerstenberg, a retired Ryerson University professor. The pair are working on a biography of Salsberg, who died in 1998 at age 95.

"The family is very pleased that the scholarly and general communities alike can delve into J.B.'s rich and diverse resources for the study of Jewish life and community in Canada via the means of this collection at Queen's University," says Salsberg Ezrin.

The Queen's collection reflects not only Salsberg, but the world and times in which he lived.

Born in Lagov, Poland, Salsberg emigrated to Canada with his parents in 1913 at age 11. His career as a Labour Zionist executive, union organizer, Toronto alderman, Communist Party union strategist, MPP, journalist, in-demand speaker and activist for many causes, particularly Israel and Yiddish culture, put Salsberg in the forefront of Jewish and secular life.

A longtime columnist with The CJN, his ongoing debates with his creation, Uncle Eliezer, brought to the community, with wit and insight, a myriad of interests and concerns.

Salsberg's optimism, joie de vivre, questioning mind and ability as a storyteller, often in Yiddish, gave colleagues at The CJN many enjoyable and stimulating moments.

For more information on the J.B. Salsberg Papers, contact Jeremy Heil, technical services archivist at Queen's University, 613-533-6000, ext. 74462, fax 613-533-6403, or e-mail heilj@post.queensu.ca.

Serious injury teaches student importance of CARD

By ADAM GRACHNIK
CJN Intern

Three years ago, as she lay curled up on the hard wet dirt, drifting in and out of consciousness after a horseback riding accident, Abbey Simbrow wondered if she would ever walk again.

Now, not only is she walking, she is once again training in the sport she loves and helping people with disabilities at the same time.

Simbrow, 22, has loved riding since she started at six years old.

"When I was young, I was very introverted and shy. The connection with the horse was much more valuable than simply joining a group of girls and learning a dance routine," she said. "My cousins would joke that my first kiss was with a horse."

At 14, Simbrow was riding more seriously and beginning to compete. She also became involved with the Community Association for Riding for the Disabled (CARD), a non-profit charitable organization that improves the quality of life for children and adults living with physical and cognitive disabilities through therapeutic horse-riding programs.

"[At that age], I didn't really understand the importance the organization played, but I loved the atmosphere and being around horses," she said.

Simbrow did her high-school co-op at CARD, but left to study in Italy for Grade 12 and OAC. Upon returning to Canada, she spent the summer of 1999 working at CARD and entered the University of Western Ontario in the fall.

She resumed riding and began shopping for her own horse so she could jump competitively.

But in October 1999, everything changed.

"It was my second time at the stable [in London]. The horse took off before I expected it to. I knew I shouldn't do the jump. He jumped a huge jump when in theory it was a small one," she said. "I fell forward [and the horse was in] full gallop. I thought I would get trampled, or killed, so I forced myself to fall off to the side."

She said the pain intensified by the minute and she started yelling. An ambulance arrived quickly and she was treated for a major spinal injury.

"I was screaming and screaming. I was shocked, but I wiggled my toes and fingers," Simbrow said. "[I thought], am I going to be paralyzed?"

She wasn't, but she missed almost three months of school while recovering at her home in York Mills with a broken back.

"The accident gave me a whole new perspective on what the [CARD] riders go through."

Slowly, she regained her confidence and by her second year at Western, she got involved with SARI, a therapeutic riding centre in London.

But her true home has been at CARD.

"If you're a disabled person who isn't necessarily accepted in the able-bodied community, when you come to CARD everyone is on equal ground," Simbrow said.

Abbey Simbrow (left) has been involved with the Community Association for Riding for the Disabled (CARD) since she was 14, yet three years ago, she almost never walked again after falling off a horse. She's seen here with CARD rider Naomi Shofer (middle) and CARD's Board of Director's chair, Michele Green.

CARD has been operating since 1969 and has been based out of G. Ross Lord Park since 1979. It has 190 riders and 280 volunteers.

The chair of its board, Michele Green, said it's "really important for everybody to have a place where they can come where they're just accepted for who they are. That is what happens here.

"The purpose is to improve the quality of life for people with disabilities," she added. "It improves quality of life, physically, emotionally and socially. Riders are faced daily with challenges and attitudes from other people that the message is for them, that they can't do things. Here they learn they can."

Green knows first-hand the importance of CARD. With retinitis pigmentosa, an inherited disease in which the retina degenerates in tiny patches, her vision continues to deteriorate.

By the late 1980s, she couldn't ride at "able-bodied stables," she said, because of her continuing loss of vision. After a few years away from riding, she heard about CARD and began riding with the group in 1993.

"I benefited so much. The program made such a profound change in my life that I wanted to give back," said Green, who began as a rider, but has now been on CARD's board of directors for eight years, including the past two as its chair.

Therapeutic riding, Simbrow said, has done amazing things for the riders.

One of those riders is Naomi Shofer, 8, who has cerebral palsy. When she began riding with CARD at 3½ years old, she couldn't walk. Now, she can.

"It's fun," Naomi said of riding with CARD.

Her mother, Daphne Tsur, said her daughter has also had outside therapy, but that Naomi "has improved so much since she [has been riding with CARD]. She feels very special and unique."

Simbrow is working for CARD again this summer. She is fully healed from her 1999 accident and is once again looking to purchase her own horse. In the fall she will graduate from the University of Western Ontario with a degree in women's studies. She plans to pursue therapeutic riding as a career.

"I just love it," she said.

To get involved with CARD, call executive director Sandy Webster Stolte at 416-739-8600, or visit CARD's Web site at www.card.ca.

About Nutrition

By LISA WEINBERG

Q. My husband and I have an ongoing debate about feeding our 18-month-old and 3½-year-old. When our children say they are finished eating, he almost always disagrees and asks them to either finish all or part of what is left on their plates. This becomes a painful process with them fighting every step of the way. Who should decide when they're done – them or us?

A. Great question. This is a common mistake made by parents and consistency between parents is essential. Children are very good regulators, naturally of when they are hungry and when they are full. In most cases, you should let your children decide when they have had enough. Unless your child is not growing appropriately, you should never force food on him or her. Making children eat everything on their plate can lead to obese adults who feel they have to continue this custom. Forcing kids to finish their veggies, for example, before leaving the table, sets up eating vegetables as a punishment, leading to teens and adults who hate veggies. Yes, kids will get distracted easily and want to leave the table prematurely to play, watch a video or simply to practise their new mobility. Try to make mealtime enjoyable. The table should be a place they want to come to and stay at for a little while. Limit distractions in the surrounding area and let your little ones decide when enough is enough. They have hungry days and less hungry days, just like we do.

Israel releasing PA tax money despite terrorism

By GIL SEDAN
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

JERUSALEM — Despite continuing terrorist attacks, Israel is beginning to release frozen Palestinian tax funds to avert a humanitarian disaster in the Palestinian areas.

Given the Palestinian Authority's (PA) record of abysmal financial management – and rampant corruption – some Israelis are questioning the wisdom of the move.

For months, Israel unsuccessfully pressured the international community to stop funding the Palestinian Authority, arguing that the money was being used to fund terrorism or would free up other PA funds for that purpose. This week, however, Israel released some $15 million (US) to the Palestinian Authority as a goodwill gesture and a means of improving conditions for the Palestinian population.

Last Wednesday – the same day a bombing at Hebrew University's Mt. Scopus campus killed at least seven people and wounded more than 80 – PA Finance Minister Salam Fayed confirmed the money had been deposited in the PA's account at the Bank of Israel.

Fayed denied Israeli claims that Israel had set conditions on the transfer of the funds. "The Palestinian Authority refuses any conditions to get any of our frozen money from Israel. This money is the Palestinian right," he said in a statement.

Ra'anan Gissin, an adviser to Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon, said Israel doesn't want the money "to go to any of the Palestinian institutions where the money either goes into their pockets" or goes to "finance organizations that carry out terrorist attacks against us."

Facing severe international criticism for the July 23 assassination of the military leader of Hamas – in a bombing raid that also killed at least 14 Palestinian civilians – Sharon waived his condition that a monitoring system with U.S. participation be put in place to ensure that released funds are used correctly.

The move came after the U.S. ambassador to Israel, Daniel Kurtzer, warned the plight of Palestinian civilians was becoming catastrophic. After the Gaza debacle, it seemed, Israel could ill afford international condemnation for reports showing, for example, a rise in malnutrition among Palestinians.

Yet the move also comes amid revelations, contained in official Palestinian documents seized during an Israeli invasion this spring, of the elaborate mechanisms that PA President Yasser Arafat and other officials used to divert money from the PA budget to terrorist groups leading the attack on Israel.

Among the ruses, according to translations of the seized documents, was a system under which terrorists were appointed as assistants to official Palestinian security forces so that their salaries and operational expenses could be paid from the budget.

In addition, according to reports in the Israeli media, the Palestinian Authority manipulated the dollar-to-shekel exchange rate on donor funds from abroad, siphoning off the difference – some 20 per cent of the funds – as a sort of tax that could be hidden from auditors and used at Arafat's discretion.

According to the Oslo agreements, Israel has been the trustee of customs and value added tax from Palestinian purchases in Israel or on goods imported to the PA through Israel.

Shortly after the intifadah began in September 2000, Israel froze those assets on two grounds: Given the de facto state of war, it argued, the Palestinians might use any transferred funds for terrorist activities. In addition, given the PA's financial disorder and opacity, there was almost no way of guaranteeing that the money would go to the proper accounts.

Critics say Israeli policies are strangling the Palestinian economy and deliberately harming the civilian population.

According to preliminary results released last week from a study commissioned by the U.S. government's USAID, nearly one-third of young Palestinian children are chronically malnourished, more than four times the rate before the intifadah began 22 months ago.

Palestinians blame Israeli restrictions imposed during the intifadah. "It is time that people pay attention to the real crisis emerging," Palestinian official Hanan Ashrawi said. "It's a type of collective punishment in terms of health that will have implications for generations."

Israel maintains that the restrictions it has imposed – such as roadblocks, curfews and revoking work permits – are necessary to stop terrorists from entering Israel, and notes that the steps have been taken in the context of a war the Palestinians initiated.

And yet Sharon apparently believes that the international community most likely will blame Israel, and not the Palestinian leadership, for the Palestinians' plight.

The socioeconomic situation in the territories has deteriorated considerably in the past month, due to the lengthy closures and curfews Israel has imposed. Israel is concerned about the social consequences of the economic stalemate, which include reports of famine among the poorer strata of Palestinian society.

Decisions such as releasing the tax money and allowing 12,000 Palestinian workers to enter Israel are attempts to alleviate the economic situation.

Parents struggle with bicultural school

Although Rivka believes in integration in order to break down stereotypes, she plans to send her son to a different school next year.

She explained to me that she grew tired of placing the historical mess of the region on the shoulders of seven-year-old children.

Unfortunately, she said, "the children were being used to support political platforms and agendas that I didn't feel comfortable with."

Problems began to emerge over lessons dealing with national holidays. With two teachers in the classroom – all lessons are given by a Jewish and an Arab instructor – history is supposed to be delivered from the perspectives of the two peoples.

However, Rivka began to notice that the Jewish teacher taught the Palestinian version of history but the Arab teacher was not at all willing to present the Israeli side.

Tolerating different voices is a foreign notion to the Arab families in the school, the Winnipeg-born mother said.

There is a feeling that you're either "with them or against them" and there is no in-between, Rivka lamented, adding that it is very difficult to break through the self-imposed isolation on the other side.

"I believe in a Jewish state" and that there is a place here for Jewish and Arab peoples, Rivka said. The Arab families, on the other hand, feel that if they just wait long enough, they can "root out the Jewish state."

Arab families in the school did not accept that Jews have an attachment to this country and that places such as Ma'alat Hamachpelah (Abraham and Sarah's burial place) and Kever Rachel (Rachel's grave) are very dear to the Jewish people as well as to Arabs, Rivka said.

When the school began to delete traditional Jewish values for the sake of appeasing the Arab families in the school, Rivka decided she would look for another school for her son.

For Rivka, the answers lie in creating a more unstructured school environment with a focus on democracy and civil rights.

But right now, the Arab families, which make up two-thirds of Hand in Hand's school population, prefer a rigid teaching environment with an emphasis on the Palestinian narrative.

The Arab families appreciate the school because it is well funded and has good resources, but appear unwilling to make any compromises despite the changes the Jewish families are willing to absorb.

Debates occurred over basic Israeli national symbols, such as the possibility of changing the words to Hatikvah to make them more inclusive. However, there was no movement on the other side to be more accepting of the Jewish state's right to exist, Rivka said.

"With good will and common sense these problem can be overcome," she added. "But the other side needs to take some steps towards us."

July 29

• Israel announced it had captured one of Hamas' military leaders on its most wanted list. Hussein Abu Kweik and his top lieutenant were captured during an operation near Bethlehem on Sunday.

July 30

• Documents signed by Palestinian Authority (PA) President Yasser Arafat prove that he was undermining the Oslo accords five years ago, according to Yediot Achronot. The report was based on documents Israel confiscated from PA offices. The documents show that in 1997, Arafat began to systematically create a group of militias and shadow armies, in violation of his commitments under the accords.

July 31

• At least seven people were killed and more than 80 people wounded by a bomb planted by Hamas in a cafeteria on the Mount Scopus campus of Hebrew University.

Aug. 1

• The body of 27-year old Shani Ladani, who was bound and shot in the head, was discovered near Tulkarm. The Israel Defence Forces said Ladani's murderer or murderers had taken advantage of the lifting of a curfew in Tulkarm in Thursday.

Aug. 2

• The Israeli army launched a renewed offensive against Hamas, sending dozens of armoured vehicles and troops into Nablus in an attempt to smash the terror organization's infrastructure in the city's Casbah (Old City). Three Palestinians were killed and two wounded. At least 15 suspected militants were arrested.

• The army demolished three houses in the Gaza Strip belonging to the families of suicide bombers responsible for fatal attacks against Israeli civilian targets in Tulkarm.

'No other place I would rather be'

(The following column was written by Marla Bennett, the San Diego woman who was one of the victims of the July 31 terrorist attack at Hebrew University in Jerusalem. She wrote it in May for the Avi Chai Bookshelf, a project for participants of Birthright Israel.)

By MARLA BENNETT

JERUSALEM — I've been living in Israel for over a year-and-a-half now, and my favourite thing to do here is go to the grocery store.

I know, not the most exciting response from someone living in Jerusalem these days. But going grocery shopping here – deciphering the Hebrew labels and delighting in all of the kosher products – as well as picking up my dry cleaning, standing in long lines at the bank and waiting in the hungry mob at the bakery, means that I live here. I am not a tourist; I deal with Israel and all of its complexities, confusion, joy and pain every single day. And I love it.

I got the "Israel bug" during my junior year, when I studied at the Hebrew University of Jerusalem. I had travelled in Israel before, but living here was a qualitatively different experience.

I left knowing I would return. I was not sure whether I would study or work, but I knew that my love for Israel, my desire to understand this country and my desire to learn more about Judaism were not yet satiated.

I came back to Israel a year-and-a-half ago – and what a year-and-a-half it has been.

In September 2000, I began studying at the Pardes Institute of Jewish Studies, where I have been learning traditional Jewish texts from master teachers, with other students who represent a broad range of Jewish backgrounds and perspectives.

I have learned more in my year-and-a-half of study at Pardes than I learned during my entire undergraduate career.

But my learning is a result not only of the hours I spend pouring over material in the beit midrash (Jewish house of study), but also of my life in Jerusalem.

Hebrew U bombing victim wrote of her love for Israel

Here in Jerusalem, I've found a community of seekers: people who like me want to try living in another country, who want to know more about Judaism; people who are trying to figure out exactly what they want their lives to look like. The air is charged with our debates and discussions as we try to assimilate into our lives all that we've learned. Life here is magical.

It's also been difficult. Just a month after I arrived, the current intifadah began. My time here has been dramatically affected by both the security situation and the events happening around me.

I am extremely cautious about where I go and when; I avoid crowded areas and alter my routine when I feel at all threatened.

But I also feel energized by the opportunity to support Israel during a difficult period. This is undoubtedly an important historic moment for both Israel and the Jewish people. I have the privilege of reporting to my friends and family in the United States about the realities of living in Israel at this time and I also have the honour of being an American choosing to remain in Israel, and assist, however minimally, in Israel's triumph.

Marla Bennett

I remain in Israel this year as part of the Pardes Educators Program, a joint program between Pardes and Hebrew University. At Hebrew University, I am completing a master's degree in Jewish education while I continue to study classical Jewish texts at Pardes.

I receive a stipend each month from the Avi Chai Foundation, which is funding the program, and after I complete the degree in June 2003, I have made a commitment to teach in a Jewish school in North America for three years.

As I look ahead to the next year-and-a-half that I will spend in Israel, I feel excited and worried, but more than anything else, I feel lucky.

I am excited that I can spend another year-and-a-half in a place that truly feels like home, a home in which I am surrounded by an amazing community of bright and interesting friends who constantly help me to question and define myself.

I am worried for Israel – this is a historic moment, but it is also difficult and unpredictable. I feel lucky because the excitement always wins out over the worry.

The exhilaration of Torah and Talmud study, close friendships and a lively community far outweigh the fears. Stimulation abounds in Jerusalem – and I need only go to the supermarket to be struck once again by how lucky I am to live here. There is no other place in the world where I would rather be right now.

Mitzna tells Labor he will stand for leadership

By YOSSI VERTER
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

HAIFA — Haifa Mayor Amram Mitzna met last week with a number of top-ranking Laborites, including the party's secretary-general, MK Ophir Pines-Paz, to discuss his possible candidacy for the party leadership against current head and defence minister Benjamin Ben-Eliezer and MK Haim Ramon.

Mitzna told some of those he met that he has decided to run in the November primaries, although he is expected to officially declare his candidacy only in two weeks. In the meantime, he will put out feelers to determine his standing among party members.

A number of Labor Party ministers told Ha'aretz last week that Mitzna's joining the leadership race was good news for the party. Ben-Eliezer welcomed Mitzna's expected candidacy.

"We are an open and democratic party," he said. "I welcome Mitzna's entrance into national-level activity, and will be happy to see him by my side in the party's leadership."

Ramon also welcomed the news. "Having a number of candidates standing for the leadership will mean that Labor Party members will be able to choose the best candidate for the job," he said.

The mayor's meeting last week with Pines-Paz, which was held at Mitzna's request, took place at the party's Tel Aviv headquarters. At the end of the meeting, the mayor asked to look at the leadership election regulations that were approved by Labor's central committee two weeks ago.

Mitzna can submit his candidacy from Aug. 15 until Sept. 1.

Labor sources believe that should Mitzna decide to run for party leadership, he is likely to cause more damage to Ramon than to Ben-Eliezer, since Mitzna and Ramon share a similar support base. Mitzna, like Ramon, supports a separation fence as well as Labor's immediate departure from Prime Minister Ariel Sharon's coalition government.

Mitzna is also expected to eat into Ben-Eliezer's base by grabbing the vote of those who would support the current chair simply because of their dislike of Ramon. Mitzna is also likely to get many votes in Haifa, where the majority of Labor supporters would otherwise have backed Ben-Eliezer.

In a series of interviews last week, Mitzna said his consideration to run for the party's leadership was prompted by the fact that there is currently no alternative to the right-wing government. He also expressed his support for the Clinton proposal that supports the establishment of a Palestinian state, an evacuation of settlements and a formal agreement over Jerusalem.

Amram Mitzna

Mitzna also took the opportunity to call on Labor to quit a government over which it has no influence, adding that party voters do not view Ben-Eliezer and Ramon as individuals who can bring about change.

Sports, Science and Culture Minister Matan Vilnai is also said to be mulling running for party leadership, while Knesset Speaker Avraham Burg may also reconsider a run.

Israel & the Jewish World

A three-pronged fight against terror

By ZE'EV SCHIFF
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

Analysis

Israel will attempt to operate on three levels against suicide terrorism. It has already used two methods in the past – military action against terrorist targets in the Palestinian territories, and efforts to ease conditions for the Palestinian population that is not involved in terrorism.

The third method, newer for Israel, is to make things difficult for families once there is proof that they supported or helped suicide attackers.

Regular military action, even after the Hebrew University campus bombing, has become a repetitive ritual, with predictable cycles of operations – taking over certain areas, including comprehensive control over specific neighbourhoods, arresting suspects and destroying weapons and munition caches. These actions make life very difficult for the Palestinians who live in such neighbourhoods and towns, and often claim more Palestinian casualties, usually from among those involved in terrorist activity. Such operations are often accompanied by support from the air, whether planes or helicopters.

The Israel Defence Forces will go back to places in which it has already operated, including Gaza. The assassination of Hamas military commander Salah Shehadeh, which led to the accidental killing of 15 innocent civilians and the wounding of dozens, is not the last of the operations that will take place in the Strip.

In recent days, Prime Minister Ariel Sharon has added his voice to those calling for more aid to the Palestinian population not involved in terrorism. Sharon's two aides, sent to Washington last week, were apparently affected by a firm phone call from U.S. National Security Advisor Condoleezza Rice on the issue. The two, Dov Weisglass, Sharon's personal attorney, and the chief of staff of the Prime Minister's Office and Sharon's military liaison, Maj.-Gen. Moshe Kaplinski, heard Rice bluntly say that Israel is treating the civilian population badly and that the U.S. president is critical of the Israeli approach.

Sharon's new attitude is being welcomed by the defence establishment, including the army. Defence Minister Benjamin Ben-Eliezer has been seeking such a policy for a long time.

Orders have been given for further abatements, including increasing the number of Palestinians with permits to work in Israel, even though this will make closures on the Palestinian cities, necessary for the war against terror, more difficult.

There is a contradictory approach from another perspective as well: on the one hand, more Palestinians will be allowed into Israel, but because of the strict criteria laid down by the Shin Bet security service about who will be allowed into the country, so far, they haven't been able to fill the quotas already allowed. Ultimately, the Shin Bet will have no choice but to ease its criteria, or the political echelon's promises to Rice and the president won't be kept.

The third, relatively new area in which much more aggressive Israeli measures will be seen will be in the action against the families of suicide terrorists, specifically against those who aided, abetted or supported their relative's terror mission. The Shin Bet is most aggressive in demanding this measure and they are fully backed by Chief of Staff Moshe Ya'alon, who is said to have commented that suicide bombers should know that suffering will follow their families for the rest of their lives.

Ya'alon is an enthusiastic supporter of house demolitions as a punitive measure against the families of terrorists, as well as the expulsion of relatives who were involved in some manner with the terrorist's planing. He believes it is more moral to expel a dozen families of suicide bombers than to put millions of Palestinians under curfew for extended periods of time.

Despite the sudden flurry of media attention to the issue of expulsions, the issue is only at its earliest stages and various proposals are still under discussion.

Most children don't feel Jewish: mixed marriage report in U.S.

By NATHAN GUTTMAN
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

WASHINGTON — Most students in the United States who are born in homes with only one Jewish parent do not define themselves as Jewish, according to a new study by researchers from the University of California in Los Angeles.

The study, which was commissioned by the Hillel Jewish students' organization, found that the children of mixed marriages have a very tenuous link with religion, and most have lost all connection with Judaism. The findings have caused a stir in the United States, where almost half the Jewish population marries out of the faith.

The UCLA researcher, Linda Sax, polled hundreds of students during their first year in college, comparing Jews with non-Jews and asking those of Jewish descent about their attitude toward non-Jews and their plans for college and life.

From the very first questions, in which the students were asked to define themselves, the vast gap between those born to two Jewish parents and those who had only one Jewish parent was clear. While more than 90 per cent of those born to two Jewish parents defined themselves as Jews, fewer than half of those from mixed marriages did. Of those whose mother was Jewish, some 40 per cent defined themselves as Jewish when they came to college, while only 16 per cent of those whose father was Jewish saw themselves as Jews.

The study also found that in families where the mother is Jewish and the parents are divorced, the children were more likely to consider themselves Jewish once they left the house.

The study also found that on the whole, Jewish students consider themselves less religious than non-Jewish students.

Betel Centre brings out the best in a man

Oved Ezouri says it has changed his life and nourished a love for painting

Oved Ezouri learned early to meet life's challenges head on.

His family moved from Iraq to Israel when he was 17 because the Second World War had started in Europe and there had been two murderous pogroms against Jews in Baghdad.

In Israel, Oved became a bookkeeper and accountant for the Israeli government. As a hobby, he studied fine arts during the evening, becoming an accomplished artist.

But his two brothers who had gone to Canada persuaded Oved to move here for a better life. In Toronto, where he arrived with his wife and son in 1975, he found part-time work as a bookkeeper.

Years later, when he was divorced, Oved searched for the opportunity to explore the various facets of art and music which had nourished him earlier. He found the Bernard Betel Centre.

And for 14 years he has benefitted -- making new friends and participating in programs. The centre's art workshop enabled him to try working in ceramics, jewelry, painting and calligraphy.

Oved became a volunteer, teaching others the techniques of watercolour, woodworking and design, and making wooden airplanes and dreidles.

He joined the choir, and at special events his rich baritone voice leads the singing of O Canada and Hatikvah. He is also a valued member of the intergenerational committee.

His paintings are prominently displayed in the centre and a portion of each sale is donated to the non-profit organization.

Oved says the Betel Centre is like a second home to him and has changed his life, giving him the chance for personal growth and creative expression.

TODAY'S TEENAGER NEEDS MORE!

By Linda Shapiro

Today's teenager spends about seven hours a day sitting in school, plus even more hours riding on the bus, doing homework, talking on the phone...Today's teenager needs more.

STIMULATION & MOTIVATION

They need to stimulate their minds with thought provoking issues, socialize with other Jewish teens and have fun. They need to feel good about their accomplishments and themselves.

HEALTHY BODIES

They need to get motivated to get their bodies in gear. They need to play sports, be part of a team, develop stamina and understand what it means to do your personal best.

COMMUNITY INVOLVEMENT

Every teenager has a place in the Jewish community and the ability to make a valuable contribution. Every teenager must also realize that he or she has a special role in the unfolding of Jewish history. Regardless of background, every teenager can make a difference.

HEALTHY ROLE MODELS

They need to form relationships with role models, two or three years older than themselves. They need to interact with men and women who are grounded, with a realistic perspective on life. All too often, teenagers become manipulated by Hollywood, television and the internet.

18-year-old blues guitarist reaches a crossroads

By RUTH SCHWEITZER
Special to The CJN

Guitarist and singer David Jacobs-Strain began his blues music apprenticeship with guitar lessons at nine, and now that he's 18 he's reached a crossroads.

A veteran of the Northern American folk and blues festival scene whose latest recording, Stuck On The Way Back, has just been released on Canadian blues label NorthernBlues Music, he's looking at a full-time career in music.

But university also beckons. Jacobs-Strain just passed up scholarship offers from both Harvard and Yale and plans to attend Stanford University this fall. He chose Stanford because his music contacts are on the West Coast.

Undecided about what to study, he's narrowed it down to the social sciences or the humanities. "Music is my career at the moment," he says. "We'll see if it survives Stanford, or vice-versa."

Jacobs-Strain, from Eugene, Ore., began taking guitar lessons at nine and stopped a couple of years later. From then on, he taught himself and learned by watching master players at festivals and workshops, including Washington State's Port Townsend Country Blues Workshop, where he became its youngest faculty member ever in 1999.

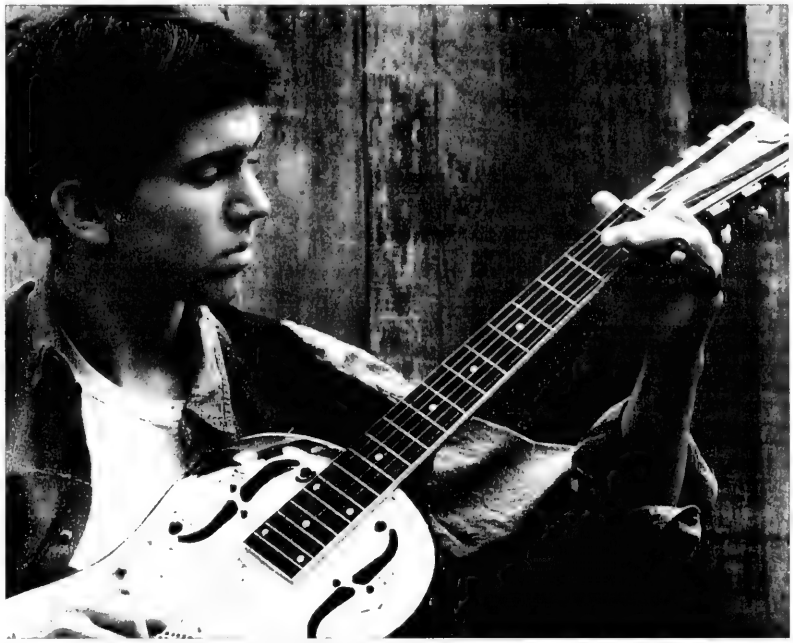
At 10, Jacobs-Strain heard Walker T. Ryan, a Eugene-based blues artist, and was riveted. Ryan's intense blues affected him "in a very gut-level sort of way," Jacobs-Strain recalls.

Ryan became one of his mentors. Around the same time, Jacobs-Strain heard the classic recordings of Mississippi Fred McDowell, Lightning Hopkins, Robert Johnson and Skip James.

"The people that I learned from had learned the music from the original pre-war blues artists in the folk revival of the 1960s," says Jacobs-Strain, who performed recently in Ottawa and Toronto.

"Walker calls his music 'American underdog music.' Playing this music always has had a rebellious and political overtone for me."

A natural performer, Jacobs-Strain first took to the stage in 1994 at the Eugene Saturday Market. He went on to play the Oregon State Fair, and at 12 he made his Seattle debut at the Northwest Folklife Festival.



Guitarist and singer David Jacobs-Strain recently released Stuck On The Way Back.

"It was clear from those early experiences that David was not only a fearless performer, but that the experience of the performances propelled his musical development forward," says Michael Strain, David's father. "This led me to look for other opportunities for him."

Strain, a research scientist at the University of Oregon, became his son's manager, with no music-business experience and little knowledge of blues music.

As David's manager, Strain tries to maintain a level of professional detachment, which, he says, "not only helps avoid some of the usual traps of the parent-child relationship, but also provides more credibility when approaching music presenters and helps to avoid the 'stage parent' syndrome."

Strain says that as a small child, David was intense, earnest, energetic and communicative.

"We have always found ourselves being pulled into his project and activities, which have included many things – art, woodworking, musical-instrument building and rock climbing.

"He did the artwork for the new CD as well as his earlier self-releases. No rest for the weary!"

Stuck On The Way Back, Jacobs-Strain's latest and fourth CD, includes traditional music, seven self-penned tracks and songs written by other artists. The singing and the playing, by Jacobs-Strain and other musicians, is intense and hypnotic and the subjects of the songs are serious.

The songs range from Jacobs-Strain's River Was Green, about pollution, to R.L. Burnside's Poor Black Mattie, about a man who worries about a woman who is losing her sanity, and Jacobs-Strain's devastating Black And Blue, based on a true story about the misfortunes of a young woman.

"Black and Blue is about a friend of a friend. The girl became hooked on heroin," Jacobs-Strain says. "She met an older man in a BMW who kept her well supplied so as to take advantage of her, and then abducted her. The line 'black and blue' refers to the bruise on her arm where she injected herself."

Needless to say, Jacobs-Strain's acoustic music is not "party" blues, the electric blues most often heard at nightclubs. "I've always been attracted to the darker, more spiritual side of the blues," he says. "I play very little party blues. It's a lot of fun, but lots of people are already playing that stuff."

Jacobs-Strain aims to keep the blues alive, so he pushes the boundaries of the music instead of playing old songs note for note. On Stuck On The Way Back, he's added some African instrumentation, for a world-music sound at times.

His new CD, he says, "has some of the feel of an old blues album, but it's not a traditional album. It's not a repetition of the past just because it's acoustic."

Jacobs-Strain expects that Stuck On The Way Back will be more of a money-maker than his three previous CDs, which were released independently without promotion.

"I have to make money playing music. It's a job, but I'm not in it to get rich," he says. "Money will be more important when I'm in school next year."

FRANZ KAFKA EXHIBIT OPENS AT NEW YORK JEWISH MUSEUM

The City of K.: Franz Kafka and Prague is an exhibit of photographs, manuscripts and books set in a series of innovative multimedia environments that put the German Jewish writer Franz Kafka in the context of the city in which he grew up, and illuminate the imagination and psyche that created his powerful literature. The exhibit opens Aug. 11 at the Jewish Museum in Manhattan.

Although Kafka never specifically mentions Prague in his famous short stories or novels such as The Trial and The Castle, the city and writer are intrinsically linked. The City of K examines the effect of Prague on the author and his works. Kafka was born into a middle-class Jewish family in 1883 in Prague, the third-largest city of the Austro-Hungarian empire. He died of tuberculosis in 1924 just before his 41st birthday.

1109 Fifth Ave. at 92nd St. Until Jan. 5, 2003. Web site: www.thejewishmuseum.org or 212-423-3200.

Committee for Yiddish: Night of the Murdered Poets is the 50th anniversary commemoration of the execution of Soviet Jewish writers and artists. The evening in Yiddish and English is sponsored by the committee for Yiddish (UJA Federation) and the Yiddish Culture Council of Toronto.

The program features chair David Abramowitz and guest speaker Dr. N. Shneidman, with music by Lilian Keltz and Alan Gaensbauer. Admission is free. Beth Tzedec Synagogue, 1700 Bathurst St. (Enter from parking lot.) Monday, Aug. 12, 7:30 p.m.

Books of Note: Two recent works present some writings by towering individuals in modern liberal Jewish thought.

Born in 1881, Mordecai M. Kaplan kept a diary from 1913 until the late 1970s, earning the distinction of being perhaps the most prolific Jewish diarist on record. He left 27 volumes, each with between 350 and 400 handwritten pages. Editor Mel Scult presents the first volume of an ambitious abridgement. Communings of the Spirit (Wayne State University Press) takes in the years 1913 to 1934, which were obviously pivotal for this founder of the Reconstructionist movement. The diaries are brimming with intelligence; Scult calls them Kaplan's greatest literary achievement.

An English Jew: The Life and Writings of Claude Montefiore (Vallentine Mitchell) is presented "to mark the centenary of the birth of liberal Judaism" in England. Montefiore (1858-1938) asserted that Christianity was essentially an offshoot religion of Judaism and brought both Christian scriptures as well as the Hebrew Bible within the compass of his thought. This volume, edited by Edward Kessler, is a select anthology of Montefiore's writings, together with Kessler's own clear analysis.

And here are details of several recent books pertaining to the Holocaust:

The Nazis' Last Victims: The Holocaust in Hungary has emerged in paperback from Wayne State University Press. It contains a series of essays about the event that Winston Churchill described as perhaps the worst war crime in all of history. The book was edited by Randolph L. Braham and Scott Miller, has a foreword by Michael Berenbaum, and appears in association with the U.S. Holocaust Memorial Museum.

Hitler's Austria: Popular Sentiment in the Nazi Era, 1938-1945, by Evan Burr Bukey (softcover, University of North Carolina Press) is an examination of popular opinion in Hitler's homeland after its annexation to Germany. Bukey contends that the majority of Austrians, despite widespread dissent and discontent, supported the "Anschluss" regime and its anti-semitic policies until the bitter end.

From the same publisher comes a softcover edition of Troubled Memory: Anne Levy, The Holocaust, and David Duke's Louisiana, by Lawrence N. Powell. The book is a chronicle of the dramatic battle between a Holocaust survivor and a strident neo-Nazi in postwar America.

Names in the News: Michael Rubinoff, whose company is producing the production of A Chorus Line that runs Aug. 9 to 17 at Toronto's Jane Mallet Theatre, says his goal is to "produce and revitalize mid-sized musical theatre in Toronto." A Chorus Line is the first in a series of musicals that he intends to mount. He is also producing the original musical Seder for a workshop performance at the Ashkenaz Festival at Harbourfront on the Labour Day weekend.

For tickets to A Chorus Line, visit the Web site www.mrubinoff.com or phone 416-366-6754.

A dude ranch for city slickers

By RANDY ROWETT & KATHRYN KATES
Special to The CJN

SHELL, Wyo. — The Hideout at Flitner Ranch teaches city slickers – doctors, lawyers and computer geeks – to become cowhands, wranglers and fisherman.

Nestled in the foothills of the Big Horn Mountains, this family-owned-and-operated dude and cattle ranch was founded by Arthur Flitner in 1906.

Eighty-eight years later, his grandson David and David's wife Paula opened the still-working ranch up to tourists, catering mainly to grown folks wanting to experience cowboy and cowgirl life first hand.

Guests get to live out a western fantasy and be John Wayne or Annie Oakley, even if it is just for one week. It' s a bit like camp, but with all the bells and whistles – perfect for adults, although kids over 10 are allowed.

We novice riders were shaking in our shiny new city-bought cowboy boots, which the wranglers – the keepers of the horses – said are better for dancing than the rigours of riding. So we exchanged our footwear for dusty second-hand boots, and in no time we were taught to ride, western style.

Luckily, the wranglers have great patience – especially with those whose only previous horseback riding is on a merry-go-round. And the ranch's singing wrangler, Stewart Reed, calmed both horses and riders with his cowboy hurtin' songs, which helped soothe the pains some novice cowpokes were feeling in the saddle.

For the leisurely vacationer, there are half-day scenic rides across 250,000 acres of rolling terrain, including spots with names like Devil's Leap and Dinosaur Loop.

But the real test is working with the real cowboys to herd Angus cattle across the open pastures, a job that keeps you in the saddle for an entire day. The wranglers teach guests skills such as team penning and sorting – cowboy-speak for getting your act together and taking it on the dirt road.

Co-writer Randy Rowett prepares to hit the trails.

Riding at the Hideout isn't all work and no play. At the end the week, guests are invited to participate in a "dudeo," teaming up and competing in clown-like antics on horseback.

Off the horses, activities include trap-shooting, archery, fishing and the Big Horn Airboat Ride. Nearby attractions include Yellowstone National Park, Thermopolis Hot Springs, Buffalo Bill Historical Centre, Cody Nite Rodeo and the Museum of Flight and Aerial Fire-fighting, with its Royal Canadian Air Force Airtanker C-119.

"Tracks Thru Time" is offered by Red Gulch Dinosaur Tracksite Tours with Geo-Science Adventures, owned by Cliff and Row Manuel, a retired couple who discovered this pre-historic highway with their geologist nephew Erik Kvale.

Many guests make an annual pilgrimage to the Flitner homestead.

"Paula and I have travelled all over the world, but now the world comes to us. We have people sitting around our table from everywhere," David Flitner says.

Hideout manager Julie Côté and her Bernese mountain dog Baloo, the ranch's unofficial mascot, welcome guests to the ranch from April to October. The main lodge at the Hideout consists of 10 rooms in five cabins, one room in the lodge and four mini-suites, all with wrap-around porches that are beautifully designed to view the breathtaking scenery. Rooms have coffee machines, phone and satellite TV and access to laundry facilities, while suites have a full kitchen and a washer and dryer.

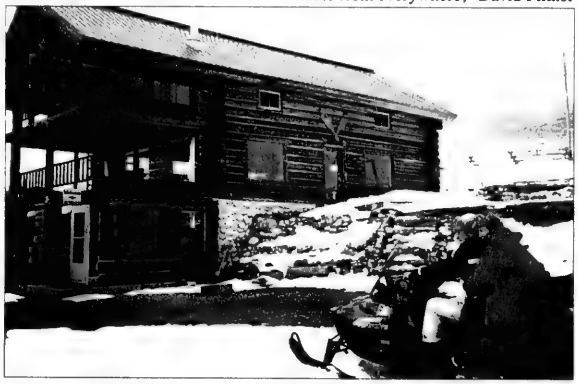
In the evening, novice wranglers gather in the lodge to swap stories and view digital photographs of the day's adventures on a big screen. An outdoor hot tub helps to ease stiff joints and saddle sores.

If you want a little intimacy, check out the Upper Hideout, which is open from July to October. Its six rooms in three cabins are 8,200 feet above sea level.

The third Flitner hideaway is the Snowshoe Lodge on Snowshoe Pass. In winter, this cozy mountaintop getaway with three private cabins and one lodge room is only accessible by snowmobile – and half the fun is getting there. Snowmobiles are available to rent during your stay.

The Hideout is 110 kilometres from Cody, Wyo. United and Delta Airlines offer connecting service from the Cody airport. Billings, Mont. is 225 kilometres from the ranch, with flights available on United, Delta, Northwest and Continental. The Hideout provides free transportation from both airports.

To book your western odyssey, call the Hideout at Flitner Ranch at 1-800-354-8637, email: info@thehideout.com, visit the Web site: www.thehideout.com or write: P.O. Box 206, Shell, WY 82441, USA.



In winter snowmobiling to Snowshoe Lodge is a lot of fun. [K. Kates photos]

Anger begets questions and triangle of tension

By DAVID SILVERBERG
Special to The CJN

At the heart of Tina Silver's play, Anger Begets, is the question: Should modern Germans suffer for the sins of their wartime fathers? The answer is cloaked in shades of tolerance and animosity in the one-hour play recently staged at the Toronto Fringe Festival.

Anger Begets centres around Marnie Levine (Sarah Dickinson), a Jewish stand-up comic seeking a new roommate with her friend Jennifer (Erin Marian) to help with expenses. Annie Sinclair (Kelly Bolt), an Ottawa lawyer travelling in Toronto for mysterious business, seems perfect: she's clean and sweet and wealthy.

But when Marnie discovers that Annie is the granddaughter of a suspected Nazi war criminal who has lived in Canada without persecution, the friendship is threatened. To add to Levine's ire is Annie's devotion to her grandfather – she offers legal advice during his citizenship hearing in Toronto.

The topic hits close to home for the playwright. Silver, who toured Europe in 1998, felt uncomfortable going to Germany. But she decided to carry on with her plan and see if the stereotypes of modern German anti-Semitism were true. She says she expected to dislike the people she met, but found them to be cordial hosts.

"When I crossed the border," Silver, 36, says, "I saw a beautiful country, with very little remnant of the past ugliness."

She became fascinated by what she calls "the relationship between the persecuters and the persecuted," and felt compelled to write about the topic.

She wrote the script and submitted it to the Theatre BC's Annual Canadian National Playwriting Competition. After she was announced as a finalist, the play was workshopped across the country, and the writing was fine-tuned to create a piece Silver was happy with.

Silver, a graduate of York University's theatre program, says the play raises troubling questions that will stir the minds of Jews and non-Jews alike.

"It made me think," she says, "and I felt like all three characters: I became upset like Marnie, I was the voice of reason like Jennifer and I felt Annie's pain dealing with this dreadful legacy."

Chris Coculuzzi directs the angry episodes without submitting to rageful exits or clichéd finger-pointing. Facial expressions teeming with pain, surprise or hatred often say more than the script.

As the triangle of tension mounts and the play questions whether modern Jews should regard modern Germans as the monsters of the Adolf Hitler era, the impartial roommate Jennifer says, "Anger begets anger, it doesn't solve anything."

But Marnie is too strong-headed to "let a Nazi get away with murder" by allowing Annie to continue living peacefully in her home.

Silver says Marnie thinks with the mentality of "If I was born in a different place, in a different time, I could be a Holocaust victim."

The play ends with the question lingering long after the lights dim. As Silver felt during the writing process, the audience can't help but sympathize with Annie, a German who never raised a finger against a Jew, and who helps an old man she presumes to be innocent.

Yet the Jewish question evokes similar sympathy. As Marnie says of the Holocaust, "I didn't live through it, but I certainly have to live with it."

Biblical story of Job produced as a hip-hop musical

By SIMONE JOSEPH
Special to The CJN

Right from the start, Montreal natives Eli Batalion and Jerome Saibil clicked.

It was obvious from the first time they worked together, producing a radio play about Chanukah for a seventh-grade project at Bialik Hebrew Day School, that they shared a goal: they both wanted to work to their full potential on the play and the many assignments that would follow.

"We realized we were both distinct in wanting to put in serious effort into these projects and make them original, creative and funny," Batalion said recently in an interview.

Their ambition paid off. Since their first creative collaboration 10 years ago, the duo has written, directed and produced movies, videos, plays and songs. In 1998, they formed a production company called Foqué dans la tête Productions.

This summer, Batalion and Saibil, both 22, have been travelling across Canada showcasing their play Job: The Hip Hop Musical, an adaptation of the biblical story of Job that has received rave reviews.

"The lyrics are mile-a-minute fast and can't stop laughing funny," wrote Richard Ouzounian, theatre critic of The Toronto Star in his review of the play.

"Batalion and Saibil have created a new theatrical form, and it's ready for Off-Broadway," wrote Amy Barratt of The Montreal Mirror.

Eli Batalion and Jerome Saibil retell the Job story as rappers MC Cain and MC Abel.

In the original story, Job is a God-fearing, upright man who shuns evil. When the Lord decides to test his loyalty, Job loses his family, his possessions and his health. He suffers greatly but remains true to God. In response to Job's loyalty, God doubles his possessions.

In Batalion and Saibil's adaptation, rappers MC Cain (Saibil) and MC Abel (Batalion) retell the tale in the context of contemporary corporate life. The vocabulary of the play includes academic words and references not typically heard in hip hop music – the pair rhyme "epistemology" with "apology," and words like "volition" and "circuitously" are sprinkled throughout the script, as are mentions of literary classics such as James Joyce's Ulysses, F. Scott Fitzgerald's The Great Gatsby and J. D. Salinger's The Catcher in the Rye.

These references are telltale signs that the duo is fresh from the world of academia. Both graduated from Brown University in May – Saibil earned a bachelor's degree in philosophy; Batalion earned bachelor degrees in philosophy and psychology.

The play reveals the pair's Jewish roots not only because of its biblically inspired plot, but also because the script contains Jewish in-jokes. At one point, the main character Job Lowe and his wife Prof. Lowe are discussing Lowe's fall from grace at work – he has lost many of his benefits, his salary has diminished and he eventually loses his job.

"I think I smell something fishy," Prof. Lowe says. "If we appeal it, could there be some kind of wishy-washy way we can stop them from squishing you like a potato knishy?"

In another scene, the pair engages in what appears to be Russian dancing, singing "Yiih, yiih" as they squat and kick out their feet. Saibil said they got the idea for this choreography from Fiddler On The Roof.

Their version of the tale ends with Job and his boss going for falafel.

Saibil and Batalion have used Jewish references before, including in two of their previous Fringe Festival plays: Everything You Wanted to Know About Yourself But Were Afraid to Ask Freud (2001) and Carl Rosensweig, How Was Your Vasectomy? (1999).

While comedy is an important part of many of their productions, Saibil and Batalion say that their work is about more than just making people laugh – it has artistic purpose.

"We are trying to send a message or teach something or provoke a thought," Saibil said.

"We try to do things people have not done before. At the very least, the goal is to provoke audience members to re-evaluate previous conceptions."

With Job: The Hip Hop Musical, one of their goals was to change people's opinion of hip-hop music. The pair believes they have succeeded in altering theatregoers and reviewers' pre-conceived notions.

"People may have dismissed hip hop music as a loud, obnoxious form of music. Now, the reviewers have said they appreciate it," Saibil said.

Today, as Batalion and Saibil make the transition from full-time students to full-time artists, they are confident in their ability to continue producing thought-provoking productions.

"We are occasionally dissuaded, told the entertainment industry is really tough," said Batalion.

"[But] our previous success is testimony to the fact that we can make a living from it, so we are going to keep on going."

For upcoming shows by Foqué dans la tête Productions, check out their Web site at http://fdltproductions.com/.

Jewish teens to represent Canada in wheelchair tennis

By ELI SHUPAK
Special to The CJN

Joel Dembe hopes to one day compete in the Paralympic Games – what he calls the ultimate test for wheelchair tennis. But for the time being, Canada's top-ranked junior is ecstatic to be going to the World Team Cup in Tremosine, Italy, next month.

The Hamilton-area resident, ranked 20th overall in the country, will team up with Canada's second-ranked junior, Edmonton's Laurie Zalmanowitz, to form Canada's first entry in the event's junior division. A wild-card berth was granted following Tennis Canada's application to the International Tennis Federation (ITF) based on the strength of its junior players and the development of the sport within the country.

While Tennis Canada has only been managing the game for the past four years, wheelchair tennis is one of the fastest growing sports worldwide for people with disabilities, being played in more than 70 countries.

However, participation levels across Canada still rank far below those of wheelchair basketball and sledge hockey.

Dembe, who hopes to crack the top 15 in Canada by year's end, has five years of wheelchair tennis experience, but says he's still a few years away from playing in the open draw, the game's highest level, on a regular basis. Currently, he enters opens in smaller tournaments.

Dembe will be playing in the second draw, one level below open in Italy, while Zalmanowitz will compete in the B division.

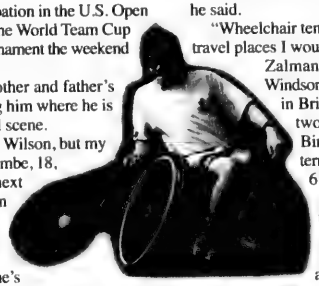
This year's 10-day event begins Sept. 13 on Lake Garda and will bring together the top wheelchair tennis players from eight nations. Competing against Dembe and Zalmanowitz will be athletes from Great Britain, Sweden, Switzerland, Australia, Germany, the United States and the Netherlands.

The game of wheelchair tennis was founded in 1976 by American Brad Parks, with only one rule change to distinguish it from able-bodied tennis: players are allowed two bounces of the ball compared to just one.

With the growth of foreign participation in the U.S. Open Wheelchair Tennis Championships, the World Team Cup was created in 1985 as a warm-up tournament the weekend before the U.S. event.

Dembe acknowledges that his mother and father's support played a major role in getting him where he is today, competing on the international scene.

"I have a partial sponsorship from Wilson, but my parents play the biggest part," said Dembe, 18, who begins his OAC year in school next month and is planning for a career in sports business. "Without them, I wouldn't be anything in wheelchair tennis. They're my main sponsors."



A partial paraplegic, Dembe says he's quite mobile for a wheelchair tennis player, although back limitations prevent him from bending down well when pushing. He was born with teratoma, a benign tumour in the abdomen that migrated to the spine, compressing it and causing nerve damage.

Zalmanowitz, 16, is wheelchair-bound as a result of early onset childhood dystonia, a complex neuromuscular disorder that has a higher occurrence rate in Ashkenazi Jews. But playing wheelchair tennis for the past four years has given him the opportunity to continue playing competitive sports.

"I was always active before I needed to use a wheelchair," he said.

"Wheelchair tennis has really helped me and allowed me to travel places I would've never gone before."

Zalmanowitz, who earlier in the year won the Windsor Indoor Classic and the Alberta Open, is now in British Columbia training and will compete in two ITF events there before joining Dembe in Birmingham, Ala. to participate in the ITF International Junior Camp, which runs from Aug. 6 to Aug. 11.

The country's top two junior wheelchair tennis players will then get back together a month later for the World Team Cup.

"I was surprised as anybody that there's another top junior in Canada that's also Jewish," said Dembe. "I mean, what are the odds?

"When I heard that there was another Jewish tennis player, I was pleased because the Maccabiah Games has a wheelchair tennis division and I'm hoping that one day we'll get our rankings up and win it."

One of the main reasons why bridge is such a challenging and interesting game is that it is impossible to come up with a set of "rules" that will tell you which is the right card to play in a given situation. There are a few sound maxims (like "8 ever 9 never" and "always cover an honour with an honour"), but the words "always" and "never" are not really appropriate. All experienced bridge players know there are plenty of deals in which even the most popular maxims do not apply.

Bridge with Gitelman

"8 ever 9 never" means that when declarer has an 8-card fit, missing only the Queen, the percentage play is to finesse against the Queen. With a 9-card fit missing only the Queen, declarer should cash the Ace and King in the hope that the Queen will drop singleton or doubleton. What about a 10-card fit? Surely it could never be right to finesse against the Queen on the first round when only three cards are missing. Don't be so sure!

North:
♠ 62
♥ 85
♦ 62
♣ AK87542

South:
♠ AK7
♥ AK9
♦ AK54
♣ J109

The bidding:

North	South
3♣	4NT
6♦	7NT

After North opened the bidding with a 3♣ pre-empt, South used the Blackwood convention and learned that North held one Ace and one King. Counting on North to hold a seven-card club suit, South placed the contract in 7NT. It turns out that 7♣ would have been an easier (but less interesting) contract to play. West's opening lead was the ♠Q. How would you play this hand as declarer?

It seems obvious to take the opening lead and to win the next two tricks with dummy's ♣A and ♣K. With any luck the ♣Q will fall and you will have 13 easy tricks (seven club tricks and two tricks in each of the three other suits). The fly in the ointment is that the club suit will be blocked. You would have to win the third round of clubs in your hand and there would be no way back to the dummy!

In fact, the only time that the "obvious" line of play will work is if the ♣Q is singleton. The correct play is to take a strange first round finesse against the ♣Q with West! After winning the opening lead, play a club from your hand. If West plays the ♣Q the rest will be easy (just be careful to win the second club trick in your hand). If instead West follows with a small club, play low from dummy and hope that the ♣Q is on your left.

The recommended play will lose when East was dealt a singleton ♣Q, but this play gains when West was dealt a doubleton or tripleton ♣Q. If East was dealt two or three clubs to the ♣Q, there was is no way to make the contract.

As this hand demonstrates, maxims have their place in bridge, but they should be applied with care. Perhaps "8 ever 9 never" should be augmented to include "10 once"!

Fred Gitelman is one of Canada's most successful tournament bridge players. His Las Vegas-based company, Bridge Base Inc., is a world leader in the development of educational software for bridge. You can find out more about Fred and his company through www.bridgebase.com. Fred's columns will appear once a month in The CJN. הילדה שאני אוהב: יהודה אטלס

"כי אני בחור שמח, קצת שובב, אך לא נורא" אומר שלונסקי לילדים. "יונתן הקטן" שמטפס על עצים, חור במכנסיו והוא מתנכל לגוזלים הופך ללהיט; מעמדו של הטבע בספרות לילדים שהיה דומיננטי בראשית המאה, נשאר בעינו עד שנות השבעים אך ניטל ממנו מעמדו הערכי ביצירות "הגל החדש". שירי הערש אינם נכתבים ברוח המדינה הצעירה התובעת הקרבה, אלא כמצב טיפוסי מובחק לילד. חרובד הלשוני מאבד כליל את הפראזות המנופחות של העבר ומונמך לשפת הילד.

SUMMER TOMATO SOUP

2 1/2 lbs. Roma tomatoes
1 onion, chopped
2 stalks celery, sliced
1 carrot, sliced
1 green pepper, chopped
3 cloves garlic, peeled
1 tblsp. lemon juice
1 leaf chopped basil
salt & pepper to taste
2 cups water

Peel and chop tomatoes. In large pot sauté onions in small amount of water for a few minutes until soft. Add tomatoes, celery, carrot, pepper, garlic and 2 cups of water. Bring vegetable mixture to a boil, reduce heat and simmer for 20-30 minutes until vegetables are soft. Strain soup, saving broth. Puree vegetables in blender. Add back to liquid. Stir in lemon juice, basil, salt and pepper. Serve hot or cold.

About Food

Come on baby, light my fire! It's barbecue time and grilling is a great way to prepare high flavour, low-fat food. The burger is king! For better-for-you burgers, use lean ground beef, veal, chicken or turkey. Veggie burgers or marinated portobello mushroom caps make great vegetarian alternatives. Serve on whole wheat rolls or pita bread, topped with sliced tomatoes, lettuce, roasted red peppers and onions. Add salad or coleslaw to ensure you get your daily fix of veggies.

Marin-aides

Research suggests that cooking meats at very high temperatures creates chemicals (heterocyclic amines, or HCAs) that may increase cancer risk. However, scientists believe marinating helps creates a barrier against heat that dramatically lowers the formation of HCAs created when meat, poultry and fish are grilled or broiled at high temperatures.

Marinating also makes food more flavourful. If you're making an acid-based marinade, use a non-reactive container (glass, ceramic, stainless steel or heavy-duty Ziploc bag). Turn the food or shake the bag during marinating so it is evenly coated. Marinate at room temperature for ½ to 1 hour. For longer marinating, cover and refrigerate food overnight. If fish is marinated more than an hour, it will start to "cook."

Drain marinade before grilling. To reserve leftover marinade for basting or as a sauce, bring it to a boil, then simmer for 2 minutes before drizzling it over the cooked food.

Don't grill over direct heat. Place food around the hot coals, not directly over them. Cook meat and poultry thoroughly, but not so much that pieces become charred. Don't eat any charred or blackened parts.

Don't peek! When you open the cover of the barbecue, it loses heat, increasing cooking time. Lift the lid only when you have to turn the food. The lid traps heat and smoke, helping to cook and flavour your food.

Cook foods to a safe temperature. Cook ground beef until a thermometer inserted into several parts of the patty, including the thickest part, reads at least 160 degrees F. Ground poultry should be cooked to 165 F, poultry breast to 170 F and whole poultry with bones to 180 F. Enjoy in good health!

ORANGE HOISIN MARINADE

1 tbsp. minced fresh ginger
2 cloves garlic, minced
¼ cup onion, minced
2 tbsp. soy sauce
3 tbsp. rice or wine vinegar
¼ cup orange juice
¼ cup hoisin sauce
2 tbsp. honey or brown sugar
2 tsp. Oriental sesame oil
¼ tsp. cayenne

Combine all ingredients and mix well. Excellent on meat, poultry or fish. Makes about 1 cup.

MOUNT SINAI HOSPITAL

The Best Medicine

YOUR HOSPITAL, YOUR NEWS

What GERMS are LURKING in schools, gyms, and the work place and how to AVOID getting SICK!

How clean is too clean? How dirty can we be and still be healthy?

No matter which question you ask, this is one matter best answered by one hand washing the other.

"People – kids and adults – do not wash their hands as often or as well as they think they do, risking poor health and the spread of infection," says Dr. Allison McGeer, Director of Infection Control at Mount Sinai Hospital.

"We should wash our hands any time we come in contact with bacteria or viruses such as when we touch our noses or use the bathroom. To wash your hands effectively, use soap, water, and friction for 25 to 30 seconds," adds McGeer.

Passing bacteria and viruses among us is the most common way we get sick with any infectious disease including colds and flu. Hand-to-hand contact is a major culprit; along with touching items such as faucet handles or telephones that are harbouring bacteria and other germs.

"Handwashing is the single most important thing people can do to prevent the spread of germs," McGeer says.

HANDWASHING TIPS

"Please, please, please don't assume that kids know how to wash their hands," McGeer implores. "You'd never assume that they know how to brush their teeth, would you?"

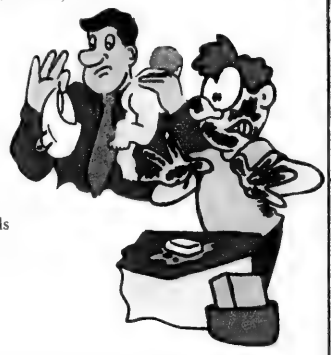
When Should You Wash Your Hands?

Wash your hands before you

- ✔ prepare or eat food
- ✔ treat a cut or a wound or tend to someone who is sick

Wash your hands after you

- ✔ handle uncooked foods, particularly raw meat, poultry or fish
- ✔ change a diaper
- ✔ blow your nose, cough or sneeze
- ✔ play with or touch a pet, particularly reptiles and exotic animals
- ✔ handle garbage
- ✔ tend to someone who is sick or injured
- ✔ use the restroom



How Should You Wash Your Hands?

- ✔ use soap and warm, running water
- ✔ wash all surfaces thoroughly including wrists, palms, back of hands, fingers, and under the fingernails
- ✔ rub hands together for at least 10 to 15 seconds

Remembering to wash your hands correctly is the first step toward staying healthy.

Bombing shocks MPs' aides

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

Parliamentary assistants on Israel mission

Missions to Israel are meant to do a lot of things, not the least of which is to expose visitors to the day-to-day lives of ordinary Israelis.

Recently, a group of parliamentary assistants got more than they bargained for during a week-long visit to the Jewish state.

While enjoying lunch at the Anna Ticho House Restaurant in central Jerusalem, their afternoon briefing was interrupted by an explosion that shook the room and prompted local patrons to check in with their loved ones by cellphone. Only a block away, a suicide bomber had detonated an explosive charge, destroying a falafel stand but killing only himself.

Like the many Israelis sitting nearby, Tanis Gilbert felt the need to grab her phone and call her family – in her case, her husband and mother back in Canada. They had been concerned about her visit to Israel and had asked that she call every day.

Gilbert, executive assistant to Montreal Liberal MP Irwin Cotler, knew it was still early in the morning back in Canada and felt she'd wait until later in the day. To her surprise, her husband, who had woken early and heard about the bombing on the morning news, was soon on the phone making sure she was alright.

Israel seeking funds to keep consulate open

By DAVID LAZARUS
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon and Foreign Minister Shimon Peres have asked their Finance Ministry to try to find the funds to keep the Israeli Consulate here open, The CJN learned Sunday.

Peres' media advisor, Yoram Dori, said in an interview from Jerusalem following a meeting of the Israeli cabinet that Peres will reconsider his decision if the money to keep the consulate open can somehow be found.

Dori stressed, however, that the original decision to shut the consulate had not changed.

"There are no new decisions," Dori said. "The question is only about money."

The news that Peres might re-think his position was expected to buoy the hopes of Montreal Jews who were shocked and outraged when news of the planned closure broke July 22.

Since then, Peres has dealt with interventions made to "the highest levels of the Israeli government," particularly by Charles Bronfman, a source told The CJN.

The source said Peres was persuaded to rethink the situation after returning to Israel from a trip to the United States.

Earlier last week, Israeli Consul General Shlomo Avital was named the next Israeli ambassador to Dakar, Senegal, giving rise to the question of who would lead the Montreal mission should it remain open. The consulate runs on a budget of $1.2 million (US) annually.

After the closure announcement, the Jewish community launched a campaign to save it.

Peres has been inundated by impassioned pleas to reconsider, and not only from the Jewish community. A flurry of petitions, phone calls, letters and personal contacts have been sent by community leaders, Jewish organizations, Montreal

Survivor Honoured

OTTAWA — Holocaust survivor Anna Heilman, 73, of Ottawa was awarded the Simon Wiesenthal Center's 2002 Medal of Honour last month in a ceremony in Los Angeles for her involvement in the blowing up of a crematorium in Auschwitz in 1944. Heilman has detailed her part in the operation in the 2001 book Never Far Away: The Auschwitz Chronicles of Anna Heilman.

ISRAEL

Citizenship Move

JERUSALEM — Prime Minister Ariel Sharon is backing a controversial move by Interior Minister Eli Yishai to strip two Israeli Arabs of their citizenship for alleged terrorist activity. The State Attorney's Office has called Yishai's move extreme.

Immigrants Arrive

JERUSALEM — More than 600 immigrants arrived in Israel Aug. 5, including 500 from Ukraine, in what the Jewish Agency for Israel described as the largest aliyah day of the year.

Flight Delay

JERUSALEM — The space shuttle mission with Israel's first astronaut, Col. Ilan Ramon, is being delayed until December. The mid-July flight was postponed after cracks were found in the propulsion systems of two sister shuttles.

Vaccine Production

JERUSALEM — Israel has begun producing smallpox vaccine in preparation for a biological attack from Iraq in retaliation for a U.S. strike. A health official said last week there is enough for the entire population, but a decision on when to start immunizations hasn't been made. About 100 emergency workers have already been vaccinated.

WORLD

Citizenship Stripped

PENSACOLA, Fla. — A U.S. Federal Court here has stripped a onetime Gestapo agent of his U.S. citizenship for assisting in Nazi-sponsored acts of persecution during World War II. Michael Gorshkow, 79, served in 1942 and 1943 as an interpreter and interrogator with the German security police in Minsk, Belarus, and participated in killing 3,000 Jewish men, women and children when Nazi-led forces set fire to the nearby Slutsk ghetto. Gorshkow was born in Estonia and became a U.S. citizen in 1963. He recently left the United States and has not responded to the case against him.

Politician Criticized

LOS ANGELES — The Simon Wiesenthal Center has urged Lithuania to act against Saulis Ozelis, a member of the Taurage district council, after he burned an Israeli flag and played Nazi military music while driving through the streets of Taurage. Ozelis said he was responding to the centre's offer of a $10,000 (US) reward for information leading to the conviction of a Nazi war criminal in Lithuania. In April, Ozelis told 50 onlookers that he was not against Jews but against the restitution of their property in Lithuania.

Deportation Order

ST. LOUIS — A U.S. immigration court has ordered a former concentration camp guard deported to his native Romania. Michael Negele, 81, served from November 1943 to June 1944 as an armed SS Death's Head Battalion guard of prisoners at the Sachsenhausen Concentration Camp near Berlin. Negele also served for the remainder of the war as a guard at the Theresienstadt ghetto near Prague.

Rally Snag

NEW YORK — A plan to bring thousands to a pro-Israel rally in Jerusalem this past week hit a snag after financial backers pulled out last month, meaning organizers could not offer the three-day trip at a subsidized price of $550 (US) per person. Its full cost was $995. Organizers said the problem meant thousands were forced to drop out, but refused to name the two New Jersey benefactors who backed out. The rally was spearheaded by Rabbi Shmuel Goldin of New Jersey.

Home Library Project

BALTIMORE — The Jewish Literacy Foundation, a Baltimore-based group that reaches out to unaffiliated and marginally affiliated North American Jews, last month launched a program to provide every Jewish home with a Jewish library. It began with the distribution of 1,000 free copies of Shimon Apisdorf's Israel in a Nutshell to Jews in North America's 10 largest Jewish centres.

High Court Upholds House Demolitions

JERUSALEM — The Israeli army is not required to give the families of Palestinian terrorists prior notice of house demolitions, Israel's High Court of Justice ruled last week.

The court rejected petitions filed on behalf of some 40 families of Palestinian terrorists who had received demolition orders and demanded 48-hour advance notice in order to appeal.

Israel maintains that the demolitions are an important deterrent in the war on terrorism. The state attorney also said granting advance notice of demolitions could endanger soldiers by giving terrorists ample notice to set up an ambush.

Representatives for the families argued that the measure represents collective punishment and violates international law. Some of the petitioners' homes already have been torn down.

Jewish students angry at U of T 'Anti-Calendar'

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

Jewish students at the University of Toronto are angry that an Anti-Calendar published by the Arts & Science Students' Union (ASSU) contains a dedication to the memory of murdered "innocents" in Afghanistan and Palestine.

The dedication makes no mention of Israeli victims of terror and such a partisan political statement does not belong in a course guidebook, said Lisa Isen Baumal, director of the Wolfond Centre for Jewish Campus Life at U of T.

"If they want to include politics, there are enough local issues that affect U of T students more directly than Israel," Isen Baumal said. "There is no one voice on international politics."

The Anti-Calendar is published by ASSU each summer prior to the resumption of classes. It compiles student evaluations of more than 1,600 courses and instructors in U of T's faculty of arts and science.

This year it was dedicated "to the memory of the Innocents, Afghanistan and Palestine, murdered," as well as to Islamabad murder victim Iqbal Masih, Chinese students and workers in Beijing and women engineering students who were murdered in Montreal.

Jonathan Leef, a psychology and history student at the U of T, said that by sympathizing with Palestinians, the Anti-Calendar was inherently critical of Israel.

"My issue is, who lets these people choose who to dedicate it to and why do they express someone's political opinions? They're getting funded by thousands of diverse students... This isn't the place to express personal opinions."

> Dedication included to murdered 'innocents' in Afganistan, Palestine

Leef said a debate over the Arab-Israeli conflict is not the issue.

"I want fundamental change, to look over where the funds go," he said.

Terry Buckland, editor of the Anti-Calendar, said the complaint about the dedication originates with a handful of students who are "reading more into it than it actually says."

"The dedication, when it was picked, was in the news at the time – friendly fire" and referred to innocent people in Afghanistan and Palestine who were affected by ongoing warfare.

"I did not say any particular groups. I said any people in that area. I thought that covered everybody," he said.

Buckland, who has edited the Anti-Calendar for 17 years, said it usually contains a dedication of some kind. Last year, it was primarily dedicated to a professor of fine arts who was murdered on campus. The year before, it was dedicated to the global effort against child labour.

"We're at a university, at a place of higher learning. The more information that is given out and discussed – it makes perfect sense at a university," he said.

Leef, an Israeli who's attended Jewish day schools in Toronto, said he's taken his complaint to the dean's office but was told the dean is not associated with the Anti-Calendar's contents, but merely penned a message of greetings.

Last year, controversy erupted over a handbook published by the Concordia Student Union in Montreal. The handbook was criticized for promoting violence, theft and for supporting the Palestinian intifadah.

Children and shechinah

Each year, we dedicate this space to a selection from the winning entries in the UJA Federation Board of Jewish Education (BJE) Creative Writing Contest. Even though we are closer to the new school year than we are to last year's, it is very important that we continue with The CJN tradition of publicizing this marvellous effort by our students.

Unfortunately, we can only reproduce a tiny sampling of the winning entries, which were in English and Hebrew. We extend our congratulations to all the winners and convey our deep pride and thanks to everyone who took part in the contest.

From the editor's desk

Our ancient rabbis wrote that after the destruction of the temple, the shechinah went into exile not with the wise men of the Sanhedrin or with the lofty cohanim, but rather, with our young children.

Our children are our blessing. Through them we can better understand and appreciate the mysteries and the purposes of life, which does indeed bring us closer to the shechinah.

More information about all the winners and about the contest can be found at the BJE's Web site at <http://www.bjetoronto.org/link.creativewriting.html>. – MBD

My Siddur
By Josette Halpert, Grade 2
Associated Hebrew Schools of Toronto

Once upon a time there was a little girl. Her name was Josette. She was so poor she did not have enough money to buy a siddur. On Shabbat she went to shul and she used the siddur there. It was tattered and torn. Sometimes she found a nice fresh one and sometimes she looked for the one with the lipstick marks that showed the love of reading the siddur. The little girl dreamed of having her own siddur and told her bubby. Her bubby's siddur was white with gold letters on the cover. All the other siddurs were black. Her daddy explained that black hides all the finger marks on the cover and with years of visitors turning the pages they also turn yellow. Her mother said that some day she would get her own siddur in school when she can read enough Hebrew. Bubby said that some day Josette will inherit her white, clean siddur. It had bright white pages because she treated it with respect and care. Josette thought about it and dreamed about it. Next Shabbat she told her bubby: "I thank you for offering me your siddur but I never want to inherit your siddur if it means not having you stand beside me on Shabbat. I love to look over your arm to your siddur and find the right page and get that secret loving smile. I also love to use a different siddur every week and look for the kissy marks, the finger prints, the crumbs and the yellow pages. Those are not marks of age and over use. They are signs of love which make each one special. Each one is my own for a few hours each week."

A Treasure in My Home
Rivki Berkovits, Grade Six
Eitz Chaim Day School

There is a treasure in my home,
It glows, unceasing,
Its brightness illuminates my home,
And happiness falls over my family

There is a treasure in my home,
It lends warmth to my family,
And gives out smiles,
Bright and happy smiles,
That makes me happy inside

There is a treasure in my home,
Rubies, sapphires, emeralds and diamonds
Are held within the old wooden chest
And they sparkle with a radiant glow
Through a crack in the closet.

There is a treasure in my home,
Wisdom and humour and age,
Are placed within each jewel in my box,
And they shine in their own unique way.

There is a treasure in my home,
A treasure I cherish more than anything
Full of love, caring and warmth,
For after all,
the treasure is my family.

Eradicating terrorism first step for Israel: NRP

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

The eradication of Palestinian terrorism, rather than the attainment of peace, should be Israel's first and foremost priority, says Efraim (Effi) Eitam, leader of the National Religious Party (NRP).

"Defeating terrorism paves the way for a settlement," he declared in an interview last week in Toronto.

In Eitam's view, Israel can smash Palestinian terrorism. "We can do it. But if we fail, the alternative will be terrible."

The 49-year-old former Israeli army general was invited here by Marvin Igelman and Michael Serruya of The Canadian Friends of the Western Wall Foundation.

Eitam delivered a speech at the Sephardic Kehila Centre. It was not his first visit to Canada, having previously been here as a guest of the Canadian army.

Prior to his appearance in Toronto, he made a swing through the United States, where he met with local Jewish communities. He also conferred with Bush administration officials.

Eitam, who was appointed NRP leader last April, is a minister-without-portfolio in the Israeli government, responsible for security affairs.

A native of Kibbutz Ein Gev, on the shore of the Sea of Galilee, he served in the Israeli army for 30 years, retiring in 2000 as a brigadier-general.

Eitam wears a kippah, and was, in his words, the army's "first senior religious officer."

He retired after concluding that his status as a religious Jew would retard his chances of being promoted. "I was really a unique phenomenon in the Israeli army," he said. His abrupt retirement was also precipitated by a disagreement with former prime minister Ehud Barak over his government's plan to withdraw unilaterally from southern Lebanon.

Eitam, who commanded Israeli forces in southern Lebanon in 1998 and 1999, opposed the May 2000 pullout. In retrospect, he believes, it inspired the Palestinians to launch the second intifadah, just four months later.

"We gave terrorists a gift of motivation," he said, referring to the current Palestinian leadership. "Terror defeated the best army in the world."

If Israel fails to defeat terrorism decisively, he cautioned, "there won't be one safe place for democracy in the world."

Must commit greater forces to disarm, arrest and kill every Palestinian involved in terrorism: Eitam

Eitam, who makes no secret of his ambition to be Israel's first prime minister from the national religious camp, urged Prime Minister Ariel Sharon to completely squelch terrorism in the Palestinian autonomous areas, occupied by Israel since a wave of suicide bombings and shootings in June.

"Israel has to commit greater forces and disarm, arrest and kill every Palestinian involved in terrorism." In his estimation, there are 3,000 to 4,000 such Palestinian militants.

To win the battle against terrorism, Israel must also close mosques and schools that are centres of anti-Israel incitement.

He praised the Israeli government for its latest military offensive in the West Bank, but said it should have been launched at least a year ago.

Once terrorism has been destroyed, a battle that Eitam estimates may take at least a decade, Israel should help local Palestinians to rebuild their shattered infrastructure under the umbrella of local autonomy.

Eitam, who described the Oslo peace process as "morally and militarily wrong," said Israel should retain permanent control of the West Bank and Gaza Strip.

Israel, he added, should not deal with the Palestinian Authority or its president, Yasser Arafat.

"I don't see any reason why Arafat and his gang should enjoy legitimacy and protection from the civilized world."

He claimed there are currently no moderate Palestinian leaders for Israel to negotiate with.

Once the Palestinians are weaned off terrorism, Israel should encourage Egypt to offer them a state in parts of the Sinai Peninsula. "Sinai is an empty area, and we can use it to ease the Palestinian problem."

Jordan, he went on to say, should be the site of a second Palestinian state.

Eitam insisted these plans are very realistic. "It's the most rational and realistic idea. The alternative could be war."

Israel should allow the inhabitants of the West Bank and Gaza to choose where they will live: either in the West Bank and Gaza, without voting rights or sovereignty, or in the new Palestinian states in Sinai and Jordan.

In principle and practice, he said, he opposes transferring, or expelling, Palestinians from their present homes in the West Bank and Gaza.

But in a veiled warning, he said the Palestinians may find themselves stranded in Jordan as refugees should another Mideast war break out.

Eitam called on Israel to inform the Palestinians in no uncertain terms that they will never be granted sovereignty in the West Bank or Gaza.

Sooner or later, the Israeli army will have to crack down on terrorism in Gaza, a hotbed of Islamic fundamentalism and of Hamas. But right now, the focus should be on ridding the West Bank of terrorism.

Palestinian militants such as Marwan Barghouti, currently under arrest by Israel, should be assassinated, Eitam said.

He dismissed the concept of unilateral separation as "rubbish," saying it was promoted by Israelis "who brought us Oslo" and would endanger Israelis living in the West Bank and Gaza.

Describing the current regime in Iraq as a threat to Israel, Eitam said that Iraq's non-conventional weapons of mass destruction must be eliminated.

Israel should encourage the United States to unseat Iraqi leader Saddam Hussein. But if the Bush administration does not do so, Israel should act. "If we don't, we'll be in great trouble. In two to three years, Iraq will have operational nuclear capabilities."

Eitam, who lives on the Golan Heights with his wife and eight children, speculated that Syria would probably rein in Hezbollah,

Israel gets economic boost from virtual tourism

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

When Rabbi John Moscowitz, senior rabbi of Holy Blossom Temple, participated in a recent study tour to Israel, he was accompanied by many more than the 22 people who actually went with him.

He also travelled with a number of "virtual tourists" who accompanied the members of Holy Blossom and Beth Tzedec Synagogue.

The "tourists," who could not take part in the recent visit to The Shalom Hartman Institute in Jerusalem, sent money for the travellers to spend for them in Israel.

Rabbi Moscowitz said he appealed to members of his congregation to become virtual tourists after reading an Internet letter from Dvora Levin, a woman who had lived in Israel for 13 years, and now lives in Victoria, B.C.

Levin, who belongs to Congregation Emanu-el, said that before she went on a recent trip to Israel, Rabbi Harry Bremmer, spiritual leader of the congregation, asked members of the community to travel with her virtually.

"Most of the members of my congregation were heartfelt in their support for Israelis, [but] the realities of lives prevented them from coming personally...

"So they sent me $1,700 for me to spend on virtual drinks, meals, services and gifts. They particularly asked me to support small businesses suffering from serious economic losses due to direct and threatened terrorist attacks and lack of tourism," Levin said.

Each time she paid for a meal or made a purchase, she said, she used her own money in addition to the money given to her by the others, thereby strengthening the bond between the Israeli shop owners and her own Victoria community.

Rabbi Moscowitz said that on his trip, "If three of us went to a restaurant, we paid for four or five people, and when we gave money to street musicians, we gave more than we normally would."

The rabbi told his own congregants in his Shabbat sermon and by letter that "we want to do more than study [on this trip]. We also want to be in solidarity with Israelis at this difficult time. We see ourselves as being there, not for ourselves alone, but representing every Jew who would like to be there now, but cannot for any number of reasons."

People responded spontaneously, he said, and they collected about $30,000 in tourist money without effort.

Rabbi Moscowitz said from that money, he also used $4,000 to send Ethiopian children to day camp, and $1,000 for an Ethiopian child to received dental work.

"We tried to give the money in a way that was not patronizing; we tried to be respectful at all times. The idea was not to show pity, but to show that we were standing in solidarity with all Israelis," he said.

Gavin Herman, who belongs to Solel Congregation in Mississauga, also received Levin's letter, and said that when he and his wife Shirley travel to Israel at the end of the summer, they plan on bringing along virtual money.

"I shared the letter with everyone I knew," he said. "It is a wonderful idea."

'Israel Mall' to showcase Israeli businesses

Tourism is not the only sector of the Israeli economy that has been affected by Palestinian terrorism. Many other businesses are failing or on the verge of being wiped out.

But in a country that went from being mainly desert and swamp to a major economy in only 53 years, the Israeli business community is determined to find a solution.

And Canada's Jewish community is joining the effort.

Beginning Sunday, Aug. 18 and running until the following Sunday, Aug. 25, more than 20 Israeli vendors, supplemented by local distributors and suppliers of Israeli goods, will sell their wares in a 7,000-square-foot facility recently vacated by Seneca College on Finch Avenue mid-way between Dufferin and Keele streets.

The "Israel Mall" is the brainchild of Toronto businessman Israel Kaplan, owner of Israel's The Judaica Centre, who, on a recent visit to Israel, saw the need to support and promote the country's business sector.

A vice-president of the Toronto Zionist Council, Kaplan recruited that organization and, along with Eli Poch, whose Poch Parties and Events has produced many events in the Jewish community, put together a committee of community activists to bring the "Israel Mall" to life.

On display will be gold, silver and other jewelry, pewter, fashions, foods, skincare products, printed material, wood products, Ethiopian embroidery, casual wear, Judaica and entertainment products.

There will be no charge to Israeli vendors for space and facilities, as local organizations are picking up the tab. Local companies are being offered food and merchandise concessions for a fee and the community is being asked to help provide accommodation for visiting merchants.

The "mall," at 1126 Finch Ave. W., Units 16 and 17, will be open from noon to 9 p.m., Monday to Thursday, and from 9 a.m. to 9 p.m. on Sundays. It will be closed Friday and Saturday for Shabbat.

Beyond bad taste... quite obscene

The scribe for La Presse was in earnest last week as he sat attentively in the Ramallah office of Yasser Arafat, the ra'is (president) of the Palestinian Authority, taking notes, noticing expressions, capturing nuances, recording the moment and generally being a willing conduit for the prevarications and further lies of the proven corrupt, deceitful, malevolent leader of the Palestinian people.

"I am personally asking," Arafat grinned, "on behalf of myself and my people, for Canada and Prime Minister Jean Chrétien to act quickly to save the peace accord that I signed with my partner Yitzhak Rabin."

Were Arafat's cynical abuse of language and truth and trust not so damnable, it would be laughable. But the blood of nearly 600 Israelis, not to mention that of some 1,500 Palestinians, stains the margins of the reporter's notebook, an ineradicable matting of blood and destruction, framing every word and story that emanate from the pleasant, always hospitable ra'is.

There is no longer a peace accord to be saved.

Ra'is Arafat has murdered the accord as surely as he has all the victims of the past 22 months of Palestinian-initiated terror and intifadah.

"The PLO commits itself... to a peaceful resolution of the conflict between the two sides and declares that all outstanding issues relating to permanent status will be resolved through negotiations... The PLO renounces the use of terrorism and other acts of violence..."

These promises, solemnly enshrined and committed to paper officially on Sept. 9, 1993, were but the first of many such promises abjuring violence that Yasser Arafat made to his "partner" Yitzhak Rabin. He made many more promises, equally unambiguous, regarding his commitment to the peaceful resolution of disputes and the prevention of terrorism, to other Israeli prime ministers, to the president of the United States and even to the parliament of Norway. But as events were to prove, all his promises were false, his commitments nothing more than a ra'is' ruse.

That the government of Canada did not immediately rebuke Arafat for trying to conscript it in his transparent con game was disheartening, though, alas, not surprising. For Canada's policies and pronouncements in the conflict between Israel and the Palestinians have become, shamefully, expedient, rather than moral. Arafat's advisors undoubtedly pointed this out to him. Indeed, Arafat probably felt Canada would be an understanding and even co-operative intermediary for him in light of its recent decision to omit his close collegium of terrorists – Hamas, Hezbollah, Islamic Jihad, the PFLP and the Al Aqsa Martyrs Brigade – from the solicitor general's list of "entities knowingly engaged in terrorist activity."

Arafat's ploy surpassed bad taste. It was obscene. But Canada's failure to upbraid him was beyond disappointing. It was unacceptable.

Expressing fears of younger generation

Even if David Rosenzweig's murder is legally deemed not to have been a hate crime, it is difficult to believe that his Jewish identity was not somehow part of the reason for it, despite the fact that we live in one of the most multicultural cities in the world.

Rosenzweig's death, as well as other violent attacks and implicit sentiments within this country recently, have made it clearer to me that real anti-Semitic threats exist not only in the pages of history, or in other parts of the world, but also right here, in Canada, in the 21st century.

Having just finished undergraduate school, I feel my generation has been virtually untouched by anti-Semitism. I have not known of quotas at universities, conspiracy theories or boycotts that have existed here in the past. I have grown up with limitless options, experiencing my Jewish identity as a source of empowerment and inspiration. Now, for the first time in my life, I am ashamed to say, I feel afraid to be Jewish.

We cannot, however, let the events of the recent past prevent us from fully participating in Jewish life and culture in whatever way we choose. If anything, these attacks give us more reason to be Jewish. Furthermore, we must continue to raise awareness, educate our neighbours and stop hatred, both here and around the world. Our commitment to Canada is also important, for although anti-Semitism exists in this country, it is not tolerated.

Less than 48 hours after the unforgivable murder of Rosenzweig, King David Pizzeria was open for business. We must also continue on, business as usual, remembering who we are as Canadian Jews. Lest we forget, David remained strong as he faced the horrible Goliath.

The world doesn't understand

The differences are astounding, but the world community still doesn't get it. It would seem that they want to believe the worst of Jews and Israelis no matter what the facts are.

A Palestinian terrorist wantonly murders students and there is dancing in the streets in Gaza and the West Bank. Israeli forces kill a known terrorist leader and when they find that they made a horrible mistake and also killed 15 civilians in the process (some of them children), they express remorse. Palestinian terrorists murder Jews, tourists and foreign workers and state that it is only the beginning, as if that is something to be proud of. The Israel Defence Forces destroy a terrorist missile and bomb factory and four people are slightly injured. And yet it is Israel that is constantly condemned in the United Nations. It is Israel that the newspapers portray as an oppressive regime.

You know, I think I saw a Twilight Zone episode like this. Maybe it is true. Maybe anti-Semitism is growing at an alarming rate. I would like very much to believe that that isn't the case. However, you can't help but notice that no matter how many times you point out the facts to seemingly intelligent people, they always come back with something like, "Well, yeah, but if the Israelis would just..."

It really does feel like we are alone sometimes.

Offended by letter, surprised at CJN

I write regarding the letter to the editor by Paula and Lara Braitstein ("Alarmed by Israel's approach," CJN, Aug. 8). In their letter, the women express concern about Israel's "violent approach to resolving the conflict." They say they owe their existence to Righteous Gentiles who fought "against the dominant and repressive policies of the Nazi regime," and they feel it is time to fight the same fight for the Palestinians.

This letter deeply offended me.

It equates – unbelievably – the state-sponsored genocidal activites of the Nazis with Israel's acts of self-defence. Moreover, it compares the slaughter of innocent Jews who were killed simply becuase they were Jewish with moves taken to pre-empt Palestinian terrorists who seek to kill and maim as many Jews as possible, with the greater goal of destroying the State of Israel.

As a grandson of Holocaust survivors who bears the names of those who did not survive, I vehemently disagree with the claims that these women make. While it is true that we would rather attain security through "our skill as negotiators, and through our patience, generosity and compassion," the Palestinians have forced our hand. We tried to talk, we made attempts at reconciliation, and all for naught. To blame the Israeli government for the situation and to decry its methods of fighting terrorism is akin to blaming the rape victim for the fact that she was attacked. Now is the time for action, and act we will. We must.

I am troubled when I read apologetic material by Jews who are ashamed at their own strength. My sadness is compounded when these same Jews confuse the issues, rewrite history and make Israel out to be the aggressor. While I recognize The CJN's duty to publish the views of the left as well as the right, I am surprised that The CJN printed the Braisteins' letter without considering its offensive nature and the implications of their statements.

Arab world must reform

I want for Arab and Muslim countries to have what we have in Canada and Israel: societies, although imperfect, that are built on tolerance and that reject absolutism.

Ultimately, the Hebrew University massacre was an act so heinous that it demonstrates the necessity for democratic revolutions throughout the Arab and Muslim worlds.

The Iron Curtain of the contemporary Islamic realm must fall so they can get past their single-issue sermonizing. For Zionism, through all of its stumbles, is far from the enemy they declare. Instead, it should be the catalyst that galvanizes the Arab and Muslim worlds – after all their gassings, autocracy, nuclear posturing and utter medievalism – to finally join the rest of us in the modern world.

Remembering the Romanian chalutzim

By JUDITH ARONSON-SHAHAR

This year marks 120 years since the first chalutzim from Romania immigrated to the Holy Land. They founded the first agrarian colonies, Rosh Pina and Zichron Ya'akov, and faced extremely harsh conditions, but they set a shining path for future pioneers that settled in Eretz Yisrael.

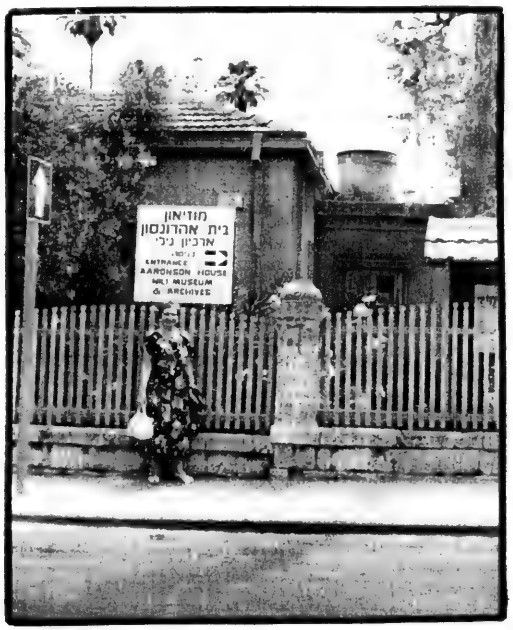
On Aug. 15, 1882, these Romanian emigrants embarked on the ship Thetis from the port of Constanta in Romania. Their destination was Eretz Yisrael. Emotional farewells took place, as a shofar blew a long sound of departure. These brave souls carried with them the dreams of so many. It was a great day in the history of Diaspora Jews and their struggle to return to their biblical homeland.

On the ship were 30 families from the shtetl of Moinesti, Romania, led by Moshe David Shub and 20 families from other towns in the province of Moldova – a total of 228 people. The immigrants weren't poor: some were businessmen, some were religious Jews, and some were well-educated. Young, healthy people were selected, not older than 40 years.

As they arrived on the shores of Palestine, they had difficulties with the Ottoman Authorities, and it took weeks before they found ways to disembark. The group from Moinesti disembarked in Beirut. They traveled on donkeys until they arrived at the town of Safed at the end of September 1882. They rented houses there, and worked in Gai Oni until they settled and built their own houses. The settlement of Gai Oni was later renamed Rosh Pina by David Shub, a biblical reference found in Psalms (118:22). The rest of the group settled in Zammarin, 25 kilometres from Haifa. Zammarin was later renamed Zichron Ya'akov, after Baron Edmond de Rothschild's father Jacob.

The Romanian settlers brought with them tools for agriculture and some construction materials. But they suffered through periods of drought. The soil was parched and the roughness of the terrain hampered their farming. The spread of malaria was a constant danger. The land had to be cultivated from scratch, and finding sufficient irrigation was a constant problem. But they were determined to face all obstacles, no matter how difficult. Later, they were helped financially by Rothschild.

Among the group that went to Zichron Ya'akov was Fishel Aronson, an uncle of my father, Zvi Aronson. In 1890, Sarah Aronson was born. The daughter of Fishel Aronson, Sarah grew to be an educated woman who spoke several languages: Hebrew, Arabic, French and German. She became disgusted by the brutal regime of the Turkish Authority that was then ruling Palestine. Her brother Aaron Aronson, a well-known agronomist, founded a secret intelligence organization called NILI, which was an acronym for Nezach Yisrael lo yeshakker (1 Samuel 15:29), meaning "The strength of Israel will not lie." The group passed information to the British in Egypt about the activities of the Turks during World War I.



The author standing in front of the Aronson Museum and NILI Archives.

Sarah was responsible for passing information to the British. But the Turkish Authority succeeded in intercepting a carrier pigeon with a message sent by her brother Aaron from Egypt. The Turks uncovered the espionage network and the Turkish Authority arrested Sarah. She was brutally tortured, but she did not reveal the secrets of the NILI network. After a few days of torture, the Turks wanted to take her to their headquarter in Nazareth and permitted her to change her bloodied clothes. She had a revolver hidden in her bedroom and killed herself. Sarah died in September 1917 at the age of 27. A movie and several books chronicle her life as a martyr and heroine of Israel. Aaron Aronson was killed in a plane crash in 1919.

Rothschild helped finance Rosh Pina's agricultural needs and founded a silk-production factory there. In 1882, he established vineyards and wine industries in Zichron Ya'akov and in Rishon Lezion, a settlement that was established in 1882 by pioneers from Russia. The baron built the water tower in Zichron Ya'akov, and the Ohel Ya'akov synagogue that still exists, in memory of his father Jacob.

Today, memories of the first settlements built by the Romanian chalutzim linger everywhere in those villages. Rosh Pina the mother of the Galilee settlements at the slopes of mount Canaan, overlooking the Golan Heights and Hula valley, has an astonishing view of the surrounding countryside.

Zichron Ya'akov, with its hills, clear air and view of the Mediterranean Sea, offers a wonderful panoramic vista. The museum of Sarah Aronson, its archives, and the story of that remarkable family, is a major attraction for visitors. The Ramat Hanadiv Memorial Gardens, with rosebeds, waterfalls and fragrant scents, are another attraction in the area.

The author, far right, with her group of Hashomer Hatzair pioneers-in-training in Ploesti, Romania.

At the turn of the 20th century, many Romanian Jews left the country by foot, wandering through Europe until they received permission to emigrate to the United States, South America and Canada. They wanted to escape the persecution, anti-Semitism and pogroms that were sweeping Romania.

Before World War II, there were 700,000 Jews in Romania. When Romania became allied with Germany during the war, the Jews from Transylvania were deported to Auschwitz; those from Bessarabia and Bukovina were deported to the Transnistria camp in Ukraine. But Jews from the smaller towns in central Romania were evacuated to large cities. From Moinesti, they were evacuated to Bacau, losing their homes and belongings. After the war, less than 350,000 Jews remained in Romania. Most of them emigrated to Israel. Today, about 14,000 Jews live in Romania.

There is a saying in Romania: "Through Moinesti to Eretz Yisrael." These words still resound in my ears. I heard them when I was a little girl in the shtetl of Moinesti, where I was born. The first chalutzim that immigrated to the Holy Land and founded the first colony Rosh Pina were from my home town.

I am proud of the brave chalutzim that laid the foundation of our future land. Their heroism should not be forgotten, but should live in our hearts and minds. They were visionaries who toiled and submitted to great hardships and brought to fruition the dream of every Jew.

I followed their example and immigrated to Israel during the great exodus from Romania after World War II. I left my parents, sister and brother and I followed in the footsteps of these great pioneers. My land embraced her children with open arms after the Holocaust. "Am Yisrael chai." My people will live forever.

Opinions

How reliable is the news?

Recently, a number of items caught my attention. One dealt with a report that Holland had prohibited shchitah (Jewish ritual slaughter). I was appalled at the news, but a few moments later, I learned from another source on the Internet that the Dutch report was a hoax. I cannot guarantee either the accuracy of the reported prohibition, or that of its absence.

Rabbi Gunther Plaut in Toronto

When faced with extraordinary reports that contradict long tradition and practice, I have made it a habit to wait a few days, or even a week, in order to give any contrary report time to make its appearance. Often enough, the waiting pays off, and I find out that what I previously read was in fact a hoax or an honest mistake.

The fact of the matter is, of course, that we rarely know precisely whether what we read and hear represents the facts. We have to trust the source that transmits the news to us, but even that is not always accurate. I myself have made some egregious errors in that respect, by having written about a subject that was reported in the press and that I criticized vigorously – only to find out some time later that I had been misled and that the object of my criticism was simply non-existent and my article, therefore, had no value whatsoever.

To make reasonably sure that what one writes about can be relied upon by the reader is difficult, because the actual events are not always reliably accessible. That means of course that, from time to time, there will be errors and a writer like me will look foolish for having based an opinion on a hoax or a mistake.

But life in general is like that. We can never be quite sure which way it is moving, or whether what we hear about some events may be relied upon. Absolute certainty simply does not exist. We have to rely on the sources that bring us the news, and if we are satisfied that most of the time what we read or hear is accurate, we rely on those sources. Yet errors will occur, and I can only hope that in my columns you will find but a few. No columnist can guarantee that the source on which he or she relies is itself reliable. The writer is often not in possession of all the facts.

So, dear reader, take everything I write about with a grain of salt, and you will be reasonably safe. I'd like to think that most of the time my communication with you is based on reality and not imagination, and it is in this vein that I thank you for putting up with me and my opinions.

The law of exemption

From now on, the heated Israeli debate over the historic exemption from military service granted to haredi yeshiva students will unfold in a dramatically different context. The recent passage in the Knesset of the "Tal Law" – which entrenched the controversial measure – demonstrates once again the intricate interplay between politics and substance. As usual, the pressures of politics prevailed over principle. The fact that the law was passed while the socio-economic burden of reserve duty is acutely felt by those who do serve highlights, yet again, the current government's preoccupation with its hold on power. Two years ago, then Opposition leader Ariel Sharon vehemently opposed the bill in first reading. Three weeks ago, he lamely explained his change of heart while voting for it in final reading.

Shira Herzog in Toronto

But the genesis of the bill shows that former prime minister Ehud Barak was no less expedient than his successor. He, too, zigzagged between an unequivocal position against the exemption during the 1999 campaign, and a retraction after bringing the ultra-Orthodox party Shas into his government. Once forced by a legal challenge and Supreme Court ruling to legislate on a matter that had been a ministerial directive, Barak appointed the Tal Commission (named for its chair, former Supreme Court Justice Zvi Tal) to solve his political conundrum.

For the first time in Israel's history, the commission attempted to deal with the complexity of this vexing issue. In order to preserve the ability to engage in Torah study, which the rabbis have viewed as equal in importance to military service, the terms of the exemption preclude the students from any gainful employment. As a result, over the last 50 years, some 30,000 men have neither served in the army nor been employed in their twenties, when many of them produce large families. The economic drain on the state's social security system has become untenable. On the other hand, the resentment of the (religious and secular) Israeli public that does serve in the army has deepened to the point of rage.

The commission felt that while the exemption was largely unjustified, revoking it could cause enormous social and political upheaval. Instead, the commission entrenched the exemption in law, while creating an "escape hatch" to deal with its economic aspect and potentially break the cycle of dependence and poverty in many ultra-Orthodox households. From now on, at age 22, yeshiva students are entitled to a "year of decision" during which they can leave the yeshiva without being subjected to the draft. If they return to study, the exemption will hold. If not, they can serve a shortened term in the military or do one year of community service, following which they can pursue any other options without penalty.

The flexible year, during which the men can either work or do nothing, is the one measure that may be the key to a slow but eventually dramatic social change. The hope is that the numbers of haredim who enter the workforce will grow, thereby reducing the burden on the state. In this sense, the Tal Law may accelerate an already discernible process. While the primacy of the diligent Talmudic scholar remains intact, more and more young men and families in that community are clamouring for the opportunities that education and employment can offer. By granting the rabbis the exemption that allows them to preserve their own power base, the law may actually release countervailing forces within the haredi constituency.

None of this will be apparent in the short term. Perhaps as a result, Israelis who are already cynical about the power of the ultra-Orthodox parties have greeted the law with a mixture of apathy and anger. In a symbolic and powerful protest against the unfair burden now formalized in legislation, several hundred reserve soldiers recently returned their military ID cards.

Like most governments, domestic, economic issues rather than the violent conflict against Palestinian terrorism will likely determine the Sharon government's fate. Sharon wants both Shas and Labour in his government. Quite apart from the legal imperative to deal with the issue, the Tal Law was a carrot aimed at keeping Shas in the government as long as possible. Sharon's next political hurdle will be the Knesset debate over the draconian 2003 budget.

Canada in Jerusalem

At the best of times, a visit to Israel, and especially to Jerusalem, has something surreal about it. And the early days of this past July were far from the best of times.

There we were, a small band of Israeli and non-Israeli (mainly Canadian) academics attending a Canadian studies conference at the Hebrew University of Jerusalem. This was the ninth such conference in Jerusalem, held every two years, and sponsored by the Halbert Centre for Canadian Studies. It was the first Canadian studies conference since the outbreak of the second intifadah.

Morton Weinfeld in Montreal

It was a miracle the conference was held at all. Other professional conferences in Israel had been postponed after the terror attacks began. People were not prepared to come.

So there we sat, Israelis and (this year mainly Jewish) non-Israelis, and listened and debated, often with great passion. Sessions were held on the Toronto school of communication (Marshall McLuhan and Harold Innis), on the future of Canadian cities, on the impact of Canadian law on Israeli law and on Canadian artists and writers from Emily Carr to Margaret Atwood, from Dionne Brand to Eli Mandel.

One sensed that for many of the Israelis, this was a kind of psychic escape into Canada. Always lurking in the background were the threat of terror and the heightened security precautions. Everyone had a story of a tragic loss or a near miss.

Why Canadian studies in Jerusalem, and why the interest by Israeli academics? At first glance, the differences between Canada and Israel seem enormous. Canada is a resource-rich, large country, at peace with its neighbours, with a western European political culture. Israel is none of those. But probe deeper and similarities appear.

Both are relatively new societies, built on continuing waves of immigration. Both integrate newcomers into a changing host society, while clashing with the pre-existing inhabitants. To be sure, the Zionist pioneers in Palestine had a far stronger historical, cultural and ongoing demographic tie to the Holy Land than did the French and English colonists in New France and British North America. But both Canada and Israel have yet to forge an equitable accommodation with the First Nations and Palestinians who were there when the new settlers arrived.

Both, too, in their own way wrestle with survival. For Canada, survival, as described effectively by Atwood, refers to the challenge first of geography and climate, a desolate, hostile terrain and a biting cold. For the early Zionists, there was a comparable struggle against the elements, unfertile land and desert heat.

There were, of course, other dimensions of survival. For Canada, survival also meant resisting the bullying or seductive force of American power, to forge and maintain political and cultural autonomy. For Israel – and for Jews in general – survival has had both cultural and physical dimensions. Resisting assimilation into the non-Jewish world and creating a distinctive Israeli cultural identity remain key priorities. But as important has been the fight for existential survival against the threats of both worldwide anti-Semitism and the fierce hatred of Israel by Palestinians and large chunks of the Arab/Muslim world. This hatred Canada is spared.

When peace comes to the Middle East – not if but when – and Israel alongside a new state of Palestine begins the slow process of integration into the region, a new parallel between Canada and Israel might emerge. A changed Middle East that welcomed Israel, that sought trade, joint economic enterprise, travel and cultural co-operation with Israel, might ironically pose a different sort of survival threat. The Arab proportion within Israel itself would likewise continue to grow. Osmosis, even bi-directional osmosis, might lead to a multi-dimensional convergence over time. With carrots rather than sticks, Israel's present European and Jewish character might be challenged.

This would be a welcome if still distant change for Israelis, compared to the present death and destruction. In this case, the Canadian-American analogy might be of renewed interest, though the cultural diffusion is one-way – the impact of Canada on American life is as yet minimal. Canadians have much experience in resisting Americanization. A new round of studies and conferences linking Canada and Israel would be ever more timely.

The Kirshner File

Ana Pauker: a portrait of a true believer

In 1948, when the Cold War was simmering to a boil, Time magazine carried the portrait of a stolid middle-aged woman on one of its covers. Ana Pauker, Time claimed, was "the most powerful woman alive."

Pauker probably deserved the tribute. Apart from being a key player in Romania's Communist party, she was the Romanian foreign minister from 1947 to 1952.

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

Supposedly the first female in modern times to hold that position, Pauker was also the first Jew in Romanian history to reach such giddy heights. In a nation deeply stained by anti-Semitism and disdainful of gender equality, Pauker's achievement is noteworthy.

A lifelong Stalinist apparatchik, she was paradigmatic of an era when Jews were drawn to Bolshevism in disproportionate numbers and, for a while, played a leadership role in Soviet and European Communist regimes.

Although she was considered a formidable world figure in her day, Pauker is barely known outside Romania today and has sunk into historical obscurity, perhaps because she neglected to write her memoirs.

Throughout her career, she was known as a dedicated, even fanatical, Communist whose subservience to Moscow was legendary. But according to Robert Levy, an American scholar who scrupulously examines her life in Ana Pauker: The Rise and Fall of a Jewish Communist (University of California Press), much of the conventional wisdom about her turns out to be largely mythical.

As he puts it: "The evidence reveals a person characterized more by contradictions than by dogmatism: a Communist leader fanatically loyal to Stalin and the Soviet Union but actively opposing the Stalinist line and deliberately defying Soviet directives on a number of important fronts – uniquely, during the perilous years of Stalin's final years."

Levy also believes that, unlike some Communist leaders, Pauker was untainted by self-hatred. Though disconnected from Jews and Judaism, she promoted an independent line on Jewish issues, notably emigration. Thanks in no small part to Pauker's powers of persuasion, Romania permitted tens of thousands of Jews to immigrate to Israel after the Soviet Union adopted a hostile stance toward the Jewish state.

She was born in 1893, in the predominantly Moldavian Jewish village of Codaesti, and Rabinshohn was her original maiden name. Hersh, her father, was successively a Hebrew teacher, cantor and ritual butcher. Sarah, her mother, was apparently the pillar of the family.

Blessed with an exceptional intelligence, Pauker graduated from a Jewish school in Bucharest at the top of her class. To further her education, she worked as a seamstress. In 1910 or 1911, she began teaching Hebrew and Judaism at her alma mater.

To be a Jew in early 20th century Romania, an impoverished nation, was to be an outcast. From the 1860s onwards, the Romanian parliament passed a series of draconian edicts drastically limiting Jewish participation in the economy and rendering many Jews stateless.

Disgusted by the rampant anti-Semitism and the widespread poverty, Pauker flocked to the banner of radicalism in 1915, joining the Romanian Workers' Social Democratic party. Most Jews, in response to their marginalization in Romanian society, joined the Zionist movement.

Contrary to the claims of some anti-Semitic Romanian nationalists, Jews never dominated the Communist party in any numerical sense. But in the aftermath of World War II, Jews proved vital in consolidating Romania's new Communist regime, even though they made up only about seven percent of the party's membership.

In 1918, she married Marcel Pauker, an assimilated Romanian Jew and fellow Communist who is thought to have died in a Siberian gulag in the late 1930s, when Stalin's purges reached an apogee.

During her formative years in the party, Pauker recruited new members, worked in the trade union of a tobacco factory and led a strike in another plant. In 1923, she was arrested and spent four months in prison.

Pauker's organizational talents were subsequently put to use by Communist parties in Germany, France and Austria. After completing an eight-month course at a Moscow "finishing school" for Communist cadres, she was dispatched to France as a Communist International (Comintern) organizer. Then she was sent back to Moscow.

Returning to Romania in 1934, Pauker was entrusted with the task of organizing the party's anti-fascist Popular Front campaign. She was arrested a year later, and put on trial in 1936. She remained in jail until 1940, when she was released into the custody of the Soviet Union. Stalin had a high opinion of Pauker, regarding her as Romania's leading Communist.

From her base in the Soviet Union, Pauker directed the Free Romania radio station and helped draw up a platform for a National Democratic Front in Romania. She flew back to Bucharest in 1944, working behind the scenes to ensure Communist party dominance in the post-war period. When she was appointed foreign minister, Pauker became the first Jew in Romanian history to attain a ministerial post.

Ana Pauker

Through 1947, in compliance with Soviet policy, the Romanian government tolerated legal and illegal Jewish emigration. But in 1948, Romania shut its gate to all but a trickle of Jewish emigrants. Then, in a dramatic reversal in 1950 and 1951, Romania permitted roughly 100,000 Jews to leave. The majority went to Israel.

The mass exodus was touched off by several factors: an economic slowdown, currency reforms and a rising tide of anti-Semitism, caused in part by the conspicuous presence of Jews in the Communist party hierarchy.

Certain elements in the party, led by its secretary-general, Gheorghe Gheorghiu-Dej, supported the departure of Jews so as to open up new jobs for ethnic Romanians and to rid the country of unassimilated Jews.

As for Pauker, she wholeheartedly backed the right of Jews to leave, and opposed plans to dissolve Zionist groups. "We can't hold on to people by force," she is said to have declared. Over her objections, the government halted Jewish emigration altogether in 1952.

Pauker's enthusiasm for emigration, Levy suggests, was a function of her commitment to Israel's existence, her aversion to anti-Semitism and her emotional attachment to her Jewish background. In comparison with other Jewish Communists, Pauker never rejected her Jewish origins, he quotes her son-in-law as saying.

Pauker, who had facilitated her father's immigration to Palestine in 1947, was arrested in 1953, charged with fostering a "nationalist attitude" toward emigration to Israel and serving as "an agent for international Zionism." She was also accused of having "deviationist" views on agrarian reform. Suffering from cancer, she lacked both the physical and the psychological strength to fight back.

Pauker's downfall, spearheaded by Gheorghiu-Dej, coincided with a wave of anti-Semitism in the Soviet Union and its East European satellites.

Although another Jew, Simion Bughici, replaced her in the foreign ministry, Levy points out that Jews from all walks of life were purged from the government and state institutions.

Pauker's arrest, he adds, signalled an intensification of the "anti-cosmopolitan" campaign launched by Moscow against Jewish intellectuals.

With Stalin's death, Pauker's long-awaited show trial was cancelled. Levy believes that her release from prison was arranged by none other than Vyacheslav Molotov, a senior member of the Soviet government.

Her house arrest rescinded in 1954, she was allowed to live with her children, and was given a minor job as an editor in a publishing house. Yet Pauker's past as a Stalinist continued to haunt her. In 1956, following Moscow's denunciation of Stalinism, the Romanian Communist party blamed Pauker and her allies for the Stalinist manifestations that had infected Romania. And so she remained a pariah until her death.

Pauker died on June 3, 1960, but the Romanian press ignored her death completely. Aside from Pauker's family, only four friends appeared at her cremation. When the director of the crematorium asked whether they wanted The Internationale played, as was customary for party officials, the family had him play Beethoven's Third Symphony instead.

This incident notwithstanding, Pauker was an unrepentant Communist to her last breath, being absolutely convinced that "the ideology (would) triumph."

Upcoming summit may be another anti-Israel forum

By KEITH LANDY

Guest Voice

For years, Palestinian leaders have campaigned to internationalize their conflict with Israel, to avoid compliance with agreements mandating direct bilateral negotiations toward peace. They have sought to widen the circle to gain worldwide support for their "struggle"; to shift accountability for the plight of the Palestinian people from their own corrupt, inept and violent leadership onto Israel's shoulders; and to try to force Israel into concessions it would otherwise not make in the context of a bilateral peace process.

Palestinian delegations have become particularly adept at manipulating international forums and conferences and highjacking the agendas of these gatherings for their own narrow political purposes. Their target of choice has long been the United Nations where a bloc of Arab, Muslim and non-aligned member countries routinely helps pass strident and inflammatory anti-Israel resolutions and prevents Israel from fully participating in UN activities. We see this regularly in New York (General Assembly and Security Council) and Geneva (Commission on Human Rights) and we also saw it, of course, at last year's UN World Conference Against Racism (WCAR) in Durban, South Africa, which, in addition to the anti-Israel elements, was also notorious for its vicious anti-Semitism.

With this background, one can more readily understand the concern of Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC) that this year's UN international conference, the World Summit on Sustainable Development (WSSD), might provide yet another stage for the vilification of Israel and the Jewish people. The summit, scheduled for Aug. 26- Sept. 4, in Johannesburg, South Africa, comes a decade after the 1992 Rio Earth Summit, and is designed to develop recommendations to implement the unfinished agenda from 10 years ago and to plot a course for the future of sustainable development. Heads of state or government and other senior political leaders will lead delegations from around the world to the main summit while a parallel forum of non-governmental organizations is scheduled to take place off-site. Environment Minister David Anderson and Minister for International Co-operation Susan Whelan will lead Canada's delegation and Prime Minister Jean Chrétien is considering attending as well.

Given the disaster of Durban, considerable time and energy has been invested to make sure that Johannesburg is a success. Thankfully, the draft plans that have emerged from the preparatory commissions to the WSSD, unlike those that set the agenda for Durban, are free of inflammatory anti-Israel language. There is a general statement about "foreign occupation" as an impediment to sustainable development, but no specific Middle East references.

The prevalent sense to date is that Durban-style rhetoric is unwelcome in Johannesburg and that every effort will be made to keep the summit's focus on the priority issues at hand, which include sustainability, pollution, poverty, food, depletion of resources and the New Partnership for Africa's Development. Still, the opportunity for politicization remains because the summit will also be examining the more vague social and human implications of such matters as well as issues dealing with "good governance." There will also likely be ongoing demonstrations in the streets of Johannesburg that might be problematic.

The Canadian delegation in Durban did excellent work in toning down the language of the final WCAR documents and they swiftly dissociated Canada from the remaining objectionable sections dealing with the Middle East. CJC has flagged our concerns about the WSSD to the Canadian government and asked Canada to play the same role in Johannesburg as necessary. We have received assurances that Canadian officials (Environment Canada, CIDA and Foreign Affairs are the lead departments, together with select parliamentarians and NGOs) will vigorously oppose efforts by Palestinians or other Arabs to politicize the WSSD with anti-Israel resolutions or language.

It is hoped that the WSSD will be allowed to complete its important work free of efforts to impose narrow political agendas. Palestinian leaders should focus on controlling terrorism to set the stage for renewed peace talks with Israel instead of derailing international conferences that have nothing to do with Middle East politics.

Keith Landy is national president of Canadian Jewish Congress.

Falafel stand bombing shocks MPs' assistants

Welcome to life in Israel in the year 2002.

Back in Canada, Gilbert said the suicide attack was "a little nerve-racking."

"In a way, I think it was helpful to us all when there was an incident, because it helped us understand better what the Israelis go through on a daily basis."

Despite the attack, Gilbert was effusive when recalling her week in Israel. The beauty of the country, its sandy beaches, its holy places, its ancient architecture, all left an indelible mark on her. Especially memorable, she said, was an impromptu "baptism" in the Jordan River – not by a Christian cleric, but by a Jewish man accompanying the trip.

"I figured Jesus was baptized by a Jew; why can't I be?" she said.

Gilbert was one of seven parliamentary assistants who took part in the mission, which was organized by the Canada-Israel Committee (CIC), the Jewish community's political lobbying arm on Israel.

Roy Rempel was also fascinated by what he saw. A defence and foreign affairs analyst for Opposition Leader Stephen Harper, he was quite familiar with the issues facing Israel. Yet he was surprised by how small the country is and by the unmilitarized atmosphere in its major cities.

"I had certain preconceptions of what security would be like – streets cordoned off, metal detectors at shopping centres. That wasn't the case, and I was surprised."

Rempel was also taken aback at "the extent to which Israelis continue to go to restaurants and to get on with their lives."

Rempel admitted he felt somewhat ill at ease during portions of the trip. On their first night in Israel, the group stopped at an outdoor falafel restaurant and he felt somewhat nervous.

Beyond experiencing the uncertainty felt by ordinary Israelis, Rempel found the trip illuminating in a broader, strategic sense. During a visit to Israel's northern frontier, a trip that only took a few hours, he witnessed for himself the pre-1967 borders and "the security dilemma Israel faces up there."

Attack 'a little nerve-racking'

Hills in Lebanon overlook the northern town of Metulla and "you get a sense of how vulnerable those communities are. Hezbollah positions look down on a child's wading pool at [Metulla's] Canada Centre," he noted.

Gilbert, who was quite familiar with the Israeli scene because of her work in Cotler's office, said she was scared during the visit to northern Israel, when the group toured an Israeli military outpost and came "face-to-face with Hezbollah."

The Shiite terrorist group has erected a billboard facing Israel on which it placed enlarged photos showing mutilated Israeli soldiers killed in Lebanon.

"Hezbollah taunts the soldiers on a daily basis," she said. "The fact they [Israeli soldiers] see this every day and managed to stay restrained was amazing to me," Gilbert said.

"The resilience of the Israeli people was amazing to me, that they go with normal lives even though things are blowing up around them. They have amazing resilience," she said.

A visit to the Shaare Zedek Hospital was a highlight for Laurie Scott, parliamentary assistant to Sen. Consiglio Di Nino, a Progressive Conservative.

Because of its location in Jerusalem, the hospital treats many bombing victims. A nurse by training, Scott was impressed by the hospital's efficiency in dealing with trauma, its triage system and its contingency plans in case of a chemical weapons attack.

Gilbert was moved by the personal story of a young X-ray technician who was badly burned and suffered shrapnel wounds while trying to help bombing victims on Ben Yehuda Street.

The woman now visits terror victims soon after they are brought to hospital and shows them a photograph of herself, with her face badly burned, taken immediately after she was hurt. Thanks to reconstructive surgery, she remains an attractive woman and she tells other victims they too will survive and be okay, Gilbert said.

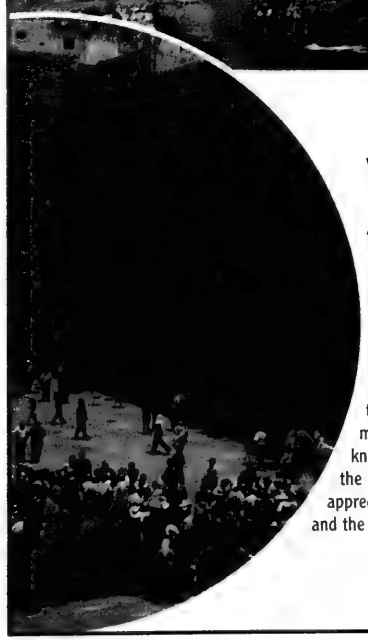
The group also met with three Israeli parliamentarians as well as spokespeople for the Palestinian Authority. Rempel would have liked to have met more Palestinians, but he said he got a sense of how grim things are for the Palestinians and their economy. "Because of the actions of the extremists, Israel has to take security measures... It just looks like a grim and wretched situation, something created by the extremists."

Scott said: "I kind of felt sad. There was so much anger and animosity between the two sides. That was kind of discouraging. I felt both sides were so exhausted and angry and there wouldn't be any negotiations... I'm so Canadian: 'Why can't you get along?'"

David Cooper, CIC assistant director of government relations, said previous CIC missions to Israel involved MPs and senators. It was thought that showcasing Israel to parliamentary assistants would help expose an important group to the realities of the situation. "They're the ones often helping their bosses doing the research, so we felt it would be good to reach out to this level of the Ottawa political establishment."

The visit to Israel "puts faces on the human situation," Cooper said. "They come away with a very positive feeling about Israeli society."

Others who took part in the trip included Mark Buzan, who works with Canadian Alliance MP Jason Kenney; Rob Moore, assistant to Stephen Harper; Patrick St. Jacques, assistant to Bloc Quebecois MP Richard Marceau; and Adam Dubroy, assistant to Liberal MP Carolyn Bennett.



It's Time to Visit Israel

From its rugged, mountainous north to its peaceful, placid south, Israel needs us now. The value of visiting Israel has never been greater. It's a wonderful time to tour this magnificent country, knowing how much the people of Israel appreciate your presence and the positive impact of your trip on Israel's struggling economy. Your visit will make a difference to so many Israelis facing hardship during this tourism slide. So, please read on for answers to the most common concerns about traveling to Israel.

The Safety Factor
Joining an organized tour is the safest way to experience Israel's endless beauty. Tours travel on secure, chartered buses with access restricted to participants, and security officials frequently consulted before each site visit.

Getting There
Many organizations, such as your local Jewish Federation, B'nai Brith Canada or the Jewish National Fund run missions to Israel. In addition, synagogues across the country are conducting their own trips.

The Cost
Visiting Israel is less expensive than touring just about any other overseas destination. All-inclusive, one-week tours can cost from $2,000 per person, depending on the sponsoring organization, itinerary, time of year and type of hotel, among other factors.

The Next Steps
Contact IGTO, one of your community's prominent Jewish organizations or your travel agent. Read this weekly column about Israel's exciting sites. But most importantly, make Israel your first travel priority at a time of urgent need.

After all, Israel is yours.
So please say I care and I'm going.

Efraim (Effi) Eitam, leader of the National Religious Party (NRP).

Eitam slams Israel's Arab community leaders and Lebanon might sign a peace treaty with Israel, should the United States depose Saddam Hussein and bring a regime change to Iraq.

Turning to domestic issues, Eitam charged that Israel's Arab community is led by an "immature and irresponsible leadership."

He suggested that Israeli Arab parliamentarians such as Ahmed Tibi and Azmi Bishara support the current Palestinian uprising and want to transform Israel into a secular state. "They want to destroy Israel as a Jewish state."

However, he noted, most Israeli Arabs are good citizens and deserve equal rights. In a vague warning, he said "it will be tragic if they don't change their leadership."

Eitam said that a bill submitted recently by NRP Knesset member Rabbi Haim Druckman to bar Israeli Arabs from buying homes in Jewish communities on state-owned land was widely misunderstood as being racist.

The intent of the legislation, which has since been shelved, was to reduce tensions between Jews and Arabs, Eitam claimed.

Eitam, who became a ba'al tshuvah after the 1973 Yom Kippur War, said his main objective as a politician is to make Israel into a genuinely Jewish state, grounded in Jewish moral and ethical values.

Israel, he observed, faces a crisis of identity. Israelis have not paid enough attention to who they are. Israel should not be "a pale imitation of the secular West... Israel deserves to exist only if it's a Jewish state."

Lest he be misunderstood, Eitam said he is not working to turn Israel into a theocracy. He wants it to be a modern state based on strict Jewish values.

Looking ahead, he said he hopes to be Israel's first religious prime minister. "It's time we had a prime minister who wears a kippah. Israel is much more ripe and ready today to accept such a leader. I want to be the prime minister who brings Israel out of its present crisis."

Israel, he said, is in dire need of politicians steeped in Jewishness.

Eitam believes that the NRP, with five Knesset seats, can win as many as 10 or 11 in the next general election.

He thinks the party has a "natural constituency" of up to 15 or 16 seats.

His strategy is to form an alliance with right-wing parties such as Likud and Shas.

If his tactics pay off, the NRP could well end up holding the balance of power in Israeli politics.

"I want the NRP to re-energize and revitalize the national Jewish camp and unite Israelis who believe that Israel should be a Jewish state for Jewish people in Eretz Yisrael."

In closing, he said, "We have to make sure that Israel enjoys a vast Jewish majority." In this spirit, he called on Jews from Canada and the United States to make aliyah.

Jewish Life

Behaving as if...

By RABBI MATTHEW KAUFMAN

With the advent of the month of Elul, we enter the season of tshuvah, of repentance. It is a time for solemn reflection and a time for re-evaluating ourselves on a personal level and on a communal level. It is also a time for us to focus on our relationship with God. These grand themes can be overwhelming, but we have helpful tools built into our liturgy which guide us through this season.

Rabbinic Reflections

One of these tools is the blowing of the shofar throughout the month of Elul. The Rambam tells us that the shofar is a spiritual alarm clock, telling us to awaken our spiritual selves and do the hard work of tshuvah, of repentance. The shofar jars us awake to do the things we should be doing year round – to make amends with others and to change our behaviour for the better.

Another custom associated with the month of Elul is the recitation of Slichot, or penitential prayers. The Sephardi community begins reciting them much earlier than the Ashkenazi community, but despite the difference in timing, the intent is the same. The primary liturgical focus of the Slichot service is the recitation of the 13 Attributes. These 13 Attributes are, as the late chief rabbi of Great Britain, J.H. Hertz, put it, a kind of "definition" of God in ethical terms, and they are derived from verses in Exodus (34: 6-7). They read, 1) the Lord, 2) the Lord, 3) God, 4) compassionate, 5) gracious, 6) slow to anger, 7) abundant in goodness, 8) and in truth, 9) merciful, 10) forgiving iniquity, 11) forgiving transgression, 12) forgiving sin, 13) and who cleanses. This listing of divine attributes suggests that what is of overwhelming importance to Jews is describing holy behaviours.

This emphasis on holy behaviours is especially important to bear in mind as we reflect upon the image of God as Melech, Divine Sovereign, that is so integral to our High Holy Day liturgy. One thousand years ago, Rav Saadia Gaon wrote a list of the Top 10 reasons why we blow shofar on Rosh Hashanah. The first of these highlights the traditional conception of God as sovereign. On Rosh Hashanah, we symbolically acknowledge God as the sovereign of the universe. As is customary at the beginning of a reign, we sound a trumpet (the shofar) before the newly crowned king. This public recognition shows that we accept the Creator's sovereignty upon ourselves.

But conceiving of God as a king is problematic because it makes God out to be almost human. Yet, problematic as it is, this imagery is universally retained in virtually every Jewish community. Is this because Judaism teaches us that we must believe in God as a male sovereign? No. This traditional imagery is in place to cause a certain reaction within us. It has the potential to elicit from within us a certain mindset and a corresponding desire to behave in such a way that the overall goal of the High Holy Days – tshuvah – is achieved.

If we can stretch ourselves a bit, to imagine God as a sovereign seated in judgment in heaven, then we can open ourselves to the positive, meaningful action that Judaism asks of us. We are prompted to remind ourselves of our own humble nature and of the importance of examining our own deeds, feeling that we are open and exposed before a power greater than ourselves.

What is required is not a specific doctrinal set of beliefs, but rather positive action and holy behaviours. We must act as if we had to report our own behaviour before a king. May this penitential season effect within us the desire to change ourselves and our world for the better.

Rabbi Kaufman is spiritual leader of the Lodzer Centre Congregation in Toronto.

Executing killers is never immoral

MYTH:

Israel's policy of assassinating Palestinian terrorists is immoral and counterproductive.

FACT:

Israel is faced with a nearly impossible situation in attempting to protect its civilian population from Palestinians who are prepared to blow themselves up to murder innocent Jews. One strategy for dealing with the problem has been the peace process. Since 1993, Israel believed that negotiating was the way to reach peace with the Palestinians, but after Israel gave back much of the West Bank and Gaza Strip, and offered virtually all of the remainder, the Palestinians rejected their concessions and chose to use violence to try to force Israel to capitulate to all their demands.

A second strategy Israel has used is the "exercising of restraint," that is, not responding to Palestinian violence. The international community lauds Israel when it simply turns the other cheek after heinous attacks. While this restraint might win praise from world leaders, it does nothing to assuage the pain of the victims or to prevent further attacks. Moreover, the same nations that urge restraint to Israel have often reacted forcefully when put in similar situations. For example, the British assassinated Nazis after World War II and targeted IRA terrorists in Northern Ireland.

In April 1986, after the United States determined that Libya had directed the terrorist bombing of a West Berlin discotheque that killed one American and injured 200 others, it launched a raid on a series of Libyan targets, including President Muammar Qaddafi's home. This was widely viewed as an assassination attempt. Former U.S. president Ronald Reagan denied it, but later admitted "it was possible, perhaps probable, that he might be at or near the intelligence centre when our planes struck." Qaddafi escaped, but his infant daughter was killed and two of his other children were wounded. In addition, a missile went off track and caused fatalities in a civilian neighbourhood. Reagan justified the action as self-defence against Libya's state-sponsored terrorism.

"As a matter of self-defence, any nation victimized by terrorism has an inherent right to respond with force to deter new acts of terror. I felt we must show Qaddafi that there was a price he would have to pay for that kind of behaviour and that we wouldn't let him get away with it."

Israel has chosen a third option – eliminating the masterminds of terror attacks. It is a policy that has caused great debate in Israel, but is supported by a vast majority of the public (70 per cent in an August 2001 Ha'aretz poll). The policy is also supported by the American public according to an August 2001 poll by the America Middle East Information Network. The survey found that 73 per cent of respondents felt Israel was justified in killing terrorists if it had proof they were planning bombings or other attacks that could kill Israelis.

The issue became even clearer for the United States after the terrorist attack on the World Trade Center and Pentagon on Sept. 11, 2001. U.S. Secretary of State Colin Powell said, "I think when you are attacked by a terrorist and you know who the terrorist is and you can fingerprint back to the cause of the terror, you should respond."

Targeting terrorists has a number of benefits. First, it places a price on terror: Israelis can't be attacked with impunity anymore, for terrorists know that if they target others, they will become targets themselves. Second, it is a method of self-defence: pre-emptive strikes eliminate the people who would otherwise murder Jews. While it is true that there are others to take their place, they can do so only with the knowledge they too will become targets. Third, it throws the terrorists off-balance. Extremists can no longer nonchalantly plan an operation; rather, they must stay on the move, look over their shoulders at all times and work much harder to carry out their goals. Fourth, eliminating terrorists can prevent attacks.

Of course, the policy also has costs. Besides international condemnation, Israel risks revealing informers who often provide the information needed to find the terrorists. Soldiers also must engage in sometimes high-risk operations that occasionally cause tragic collateral damage to property and persons.

The most common criticism of "targeted killings" is that they do no good because they perpetuate a cycle of violence whereby the terrorists seek revenge. This is probably the least compelling argument against the policy, because the people who blow themselves up to become martyrs could always find a justification for their actions. They are determined to bomb the Jews out of the Middle East and will not stop until their goal is achieved.

Jewish Life

The heretic and the sage

By RACHAEL TURKIENICZ

In this week's portion, we read one of the few commandments that tell us of the positive consequences attached to fulfilling this commandment. The Torah states that if you come upon a bird nesting on her eggs, you must not reach under her to take the eggs. You must chase away the bird and then take the eggs. If you do this, the text comments that things will go well with you and you will have a long life.

The only other commandment that promises a long life if you fulfill it is the commandment to honour your parents. Interestingly, both commandments involve respecting the parent-child relationship, even though it inconveniences you.

These two commandments gain notoriety in the life of Elisha ben Abuya, a rabbinic sage who lived approximately 2,000 years ago. Elisha has entered Jewish text as "Aher" or "the Other" since he chose to reject all his learning and become a heretic.

According to the midrash, Elisha was once observing a father and son as they were in the field. The father asked the son to climb a tree and gather some eggs out of a visible nest. The son, respecting his father, climbed the tree and began to chase the mother bird away so he could gather the eggs. In performing this act, the son was fulfilling both commandments that explicitly promise long life as their outcome. However, while chasing the bird, the son fell from the tree and died. Ironically, the deeds that should have produced long life instead led to the boy's death.

Elisha lost his faith at that moment and denounced all his learning in favour of the foreign philosophies and scientific studies of his time. From that moment onward Elisha becomes "the Other."

One would think that the story ended there and that Jewish text would dismiss any further mention of Elisha. Interestingly, we have other accounts of continued contact and interaction. The Talmud relates an event in which Elisha meets with Rabbi Meir, his former student, on the Sabbath. Rabbi Meir has come to learn Torah from his heretical master Elisha, who is riding a horse, an act forbidden on Shabbat. Rabbi Meir is walking next to him as the two are involved in a textual dialogue.

As they continue on their way, Elisha turns to Rabbi Meir and instructs him to stop his journey since he has reached the limit of the eruv, the Sabbath barrier. Rabbi Meir implores Elisha to return with him, implying a spiritual return. Elisha tells him it is too late for such considerations.

In this midrash, we have the spectrum of our Jewish nation: Elisha, the devoted Jew who pinned his entire faith on proving the words of the Torah by empirical observation, and Meir, the learned sage, who seeks knowledge and words of Torah wherever they are found.

What stands out as unique is the image of the heretic on the horse and the sage accompanying him. Elisha learns Torah with Meir because even if it has lost its meaning for him, he respects that it still contains truth for Meir. Meir learns Torah from Elisha because even if Elisha has rejected it, there is wisdom to be found in his learning.

The heretic and the sage, side by side, learning and caring for each other. The image should be etched in the mind of every modern Jew.

More back to school resources

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

Today I continue my guide to the best resources on the Internet for Jewish educators. (Even though it's summer, their students should enjoy the games and quizzes I'll mention today.)

One Web site that really impressed me was e-Chinuch.org, "the world's largest database of materials created by Torah educators." This remarkable resource allows you to download lesson plans, worksheets, illustrations and maps, which can be copied and distributed to classrooms. The Web site also allows you to download a Hebrew font and Jewish screensavers – all for free! Anyone can browse the site but you will have to register in order to download material. The site strongly encourages members to contribute copyright-free materials to the database. [http://www.echinuch.org/]

DataJEM, the database of Jewish educational materials allows you to search for resources by topic, educational level and language. For example, I did a search for Holocaust-related material appropriate for 16 to 18 year-olds in English. The site returned 170 resources, including information about relevant books, plays, films, television documentaries and museums. Very impressive. [http://www.jewishagency-ed.org/DataJEMASP/]

One of the incredible opportunities presented by the Internet is the ability to join a community of Jewish educators from around the world. For example, members of the Jewish Teaching Forum believe that "our Jewish children can study kodesh and secular subjects – such as English, math, arithmetic, social studies, biology… and even gym – according to Jewish principles and concepts." You can join in the discussion at their Web site. [http://www.geocities.com/athens/stage/4942/1JTeaching.html] You can also participate in the Jewish Teaching group [http://www.topica.com/lists/JewishTeaching/?cid=2231], Mifgashim [http://listserv.biu.ac.il/archives/mifgashim.html] and a group geared toward the joys and challenges of Jewish homeschoolers. [http://www.geocities.com/Athens/Agora/7633/JewishHomeSchoolers.html]

Rosh Hashanah is just around the corner and that means teachers will be hunting for pictures of shofars or apples with honey to decorate their classrooms. There are many good sites that provide free clip art that you can print and colour. Try Uncle Debi's Jewish Clipart [http://home.wnm.net/~debi/jart.htm], Jewish Graphics Links [http://www.bitsela.com/links.htm] and Chanukah/Jewish Graphics & Clip Art. [http://www.caryn.com/holiday/holiday-Hclipart.html]

If you are looking for photographs of Israel to liven up your walls, you can't do better than the Israel government's National Photo Collection. A search for David Ben-Gurion returned over 150 photos, some in colour. [http://147.237.72.31/topsrch/defaulte.htm] Akhlah: The Jewish Children's Learning Network provides over 300 colourful quiz cards which you can print out and mount onto 3 x 5 cards. [http://www.akhlah.com/quiz_cards/Quiz_cards.asp]

Music teachers will have a field day with the Lashir Ivrit Webpage. There are links to over 30 sites including Israeli Music Online and Hebrew Children's Songs for Holidays. The Song Archive provides Hebrew lyrics (along with English transliteration) for popular songs like Al Kol Eilah, Yerushalayim Shel Zahav and even Adon Olam [http://www.jajz-ed.org.il/festivls/ZKATZ/ATZ/music.html]

There are plenty of sites that attempt to make learning fun. One of the best is Jewish Funland created by Dr. Nurit Reshef of Edmonton's Talmud Torah School. Your students can soak up Jewish knowledge while playing over a dozen games and quizzes. History book's success surprises author

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

For supposedly just another history book, Six Days of War, published by Oxford University Press in June to coincide with the 35th anniversary of the Six Day War, has done extraordinarily well.

So well, in fact, that its author, Michael Oren, is flabbergasted.

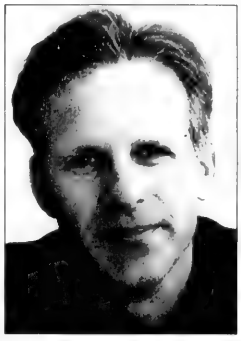
"We thought 20,000 copies would be bought," he said in a telephone interview from his home in southern Jerusalem.

Instead, the sales figures have been phenomenal – 80,000 sold and a further 20,000 to be printed in a new edition.

Oren, whose book has been widely praised by critics as the finest treatment of the subject and has been on the New York Times' best-selling list for the past few weeks, believes two factors account for its popularity.

"There is great interest in the Middle East after 9/11 and due to the current violence in Israel," he said.

He was referring to the Sept. 11 Arab terrorist acts that resulted in the destruction of the World Trade Center in Manhattan and in the partial destruction of the Pentagon, and to the second Palestinian uprising that has spilled into Israel with horrific consequences.



Michael Oren

Oren, an American who has lived in Israel for the past 25 years, acknowledged there is no shortage of books, some quite good, about the 1967 Six Day War.

Whether they were written for a scholarly audience or the general public, they were all based on the same sources: previously published books, articles, newspapers and interviews.

None before his, he claimed, drew on Hebrew, Arabic and Russian sources, or examined the war from the standpoint of its political and military aspects.

What was missing, he concluded, was a book that incorporated these dimensions and made use of newly declassified documents.

A graduate of Columbia and Princeton who holds a PhD in Middle East history and who has served in the Israeli army as an officer, Oren consulted numerous archives in Israel, the United States, Canada, Britain and Russia.

The tens of thousands of documents he read enabled him to better understand the war's political and military dynamics.

Oren, however, was denied access to a myriad of documents that remain off-limits to scholars to this day.

"We still don't know the mission of the U.S.S. Liberty," he said by way of example.

The Liberty, an American naval intelligence vessel, was bombed and strafed by Israel during the Six Day War, generating a passionate debate that has yet to subside.

In addition to poring over documents, Oren conducted interviews in Cairo and Amman with Egyptian and Jordanian army officers who took part in the war.

"They were very co-operative and helpful in almost all cases," he noted."My guess is they knew I was an Israeli. I didn't volunteer that information."

A senior fellow at the Shalem Center in Jerusalem, Oren used a researcher he cannot identify to interview Syrian army officers in Damascus.

He left out Iraqi army officers altogether because Iraq played a minor role in the fighting.

To prepare himself for writing Six Days of War, he read prodigiously, immersing himself in an ocean of books ranging from Richard Parker's The Politics of Miscalculation in the Middle East to Robert Stephens' Nasser: A Political Biography.

His objective was to produce a balanced and comprehensive volume that could be appreciated by specialists and laypersons alike.

As he wrote in the foreword: "My purpose is not to prove the justness of one party or another in the war, or to assign culpability for starting it. I want, simply, to understand how an event as immensely influential as this war came about – to show the context from which it sprang and the catalysts that precipitated it."

Oren, a former advisor to Israel's United Nations delegation, does not think that Israel viewed the war as a war of expansion.

Israel, he observed, had no master plan to conquer the territories – the Sinai Peninsula, the West Bank, the Golan Heights and east Jerusalem.

"The Six Day War was a war that few wanted and no one anticipated."

He cited an example.

In November 1966, Yasser Arafat's Fatah movement planted a mine on Israel's border with Jordan, killing three Israeli soldiers. King Hussein wrote a letter of apology and gave it to the American ambassador in Jordan to pass on to prime minister Levi Eshkol via the U.S. ambassador in Israel, Walworth Barbour.

Barbour decided to wait until after the weekend to deliver the letter to Eshkol. But before he could do so, Eshkol ordered a reprisal raid against Jordan. This attack, Oren said, triggered a series of escalations that prompted president Gamal Abdel Nasser of Egypt to remilitarize the Sinai and bring the prospect of war one step closer to reality.

By Oren's reckoning, the war could have been avoided had the United States intervened forcefully. "Washington could have told Egypt to reopen the Straits of Tiran," he said. But being preoccupied by the Vietnam war, the United States lay low.

Although Nasser knew that Israel would launch a pre-emptive strike to counter the moves he had already made, he bided his time because he was sure Egypt could absorb the first blow and win.

If Egypt had struck first, the outcome of the war would have been far different, Oren speculated.

To Oren, a product of a Jewish day school in New Jersey and the son of a U.S. army career officer, the defining moment of the war was when Israeli paratroopers reached the Western Wall in eastern Jerusalem.

The ripple effects of the war, though localized, were significant.

The conquest of the West Bank and Gaza galvanized the Palestinians and emboldened Islamic fundamentalists.

Furthermore, Israel's lightning victory eventually led to the formation of a strategic alliance with the United States.

The implicit message in Six Days of War, Oren said, is that politics in the Middle East are highly unpredictable, and that a small spark can ignite the region in a conflagration.

"What was true in 1967 is also true today," he mused, noting that the intifadah could well touch off a regional war.

Currently resting from an exhaustive press tour of North America to publicize his acclaimed book, Oren plans to write two additional books about the Middle East.

The first will be an analysis of the 1973 Yom Kippur War, and the second will chart the United States' historic involvement in the Middle East.

Former teacher helps troubled kids to overcome challenges

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

Gerry Goldberg has a mission – to empower troubled children and young adults by giving them skills to overcome life's challenges.

In 1995, the former high school teacher founded an educational program called Project Lighthouse to teach youth how to raise their self-esteem and recognize opportunities for personal growth. The curriculum currently being prepared for the project is geared toward primary and secondary students at home or in special-needs classes in school.

Goldberg calls the program his "life's passion."

His interest in helping young people cope with life's stresses goes back to the late 1960s when he taught English and history at Kipling Collegiate Institute in Etobicoke. He taught special education classes from grades 9 to 12, marginalized students who were disadvantaged or had behavioral problems. His class was located in a room with no windows.

"They were kids that no one wanted and no one expected any results from them," he says.

"I looked for answers to the question, 'How do you protect our children from falling through the cracks?' The answer led me to Project Lighthouse."

As he taught his classes using poems and stories on the curriculum, he realized his class was bored and was gaining little from the material.

"These students didn't want to fail," he says. "They needed materials that would stimulate their interest. I focused on developing their self-esteem, personal fulfilment, and emphasized doing their very best."

To accomplish this, he began collecting comic books (he has more than 1,500) and poetry that his class would enjoy and he encouraged them to write on topics of interest to them. He taught them about modern and classic heroes, examples of people who overcame adversity and rose above pettiness.

In 1971, he published a poetry anthology titled I Am a Sensation, which was created by his students. Since then, the award-winning teacher – in 1969, the Toronto Telegram selected Goldberg as one of the Teachers of the Year – has compiled five books and more than 500 articles.

Also in 1969, the CBC presented a documentary on Goldberg and how to teach using comics.

In 1977, Goldberg left teaching to care for his ailing father and the family business. His parents, he says, "set an example for me of helping others and they taught me a love of Yiddishkeit. I believe that I had something to give to others and that is how Project Lighthouse was born."

With the death of his parents and some tough knocks in business, he says, "My project of redemption offered me meaning in the face of the darkness."

Today, Goldberg believes many young people are searching for help and meaning and the time is ripe to launch his unconventional educational program. He notes that kids lack certain emotional tools needed to survive.

"Project Lighthouse is an answer to crime and to lack of respect and accountability in children," he says. "In this time of 'me-ism,' it will be a challenge to change the 'me-ism' to 'we-ism.'"

He says his program's main focus is on parents and teachers, illustrating to them the meaning of tikkun olam (repairing the world) and menschlichkeit, and educating their minds and hearts.

"It shows them how to tell right from wrong," he says.

Over the years, Goldberg has received many accolades from former students. Judy Barnett wrote, "You made me believe that if I believe in myself and worked hard enough, that all my dreams would come true, and they did."

Sandy Hessel recently wrote, "He taught me to listen to what people are not saying, to read between the lines, and to be aware of the beauty in the world around us. Amazing lessons were learned in that classroom."

Goldberg's studio is filled with an overwhelming number of collages – pictures of heroes, quotations, anecdotes, drawings and other materials taken from newspapers and magazines – as well as toys hanging from the ceiling, plastered on the walls and floor and stacked on shelves. Such collages also appear on the Web site, at www.projectlighthouse.com.

Gerry Goldberg

Goldberg, who has prepared more than 500 lesson plans for teachers, says he hopes the goals of Project Lighthouse will be understood and that he will be assisted in launching it in the schools.

For more information about Project Lighthouse, e-mail Goldberg at info@projectlighthouse.com.

New Darchei Noam rabbi passionate about her choices

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

When Rabbi Tina Grimberg, new spiritual leader of Darchei Noam Congregation, applied to rabbinical school at age 32, she did so not only for herself, but for her grandmother and her mother.

Rabbi Tina Grimberg

"I also did it for all other women who were afraid to dream, who never knew something like this was possible," she says.

Growing up in Kiev, she said, "I knew I was Jewish, and my grandmother spoke Yiddish, but there was no pride in what it meant to be a Jew. We were oppressed and shamed by it."

She recalls with fondness the times her family got together and sang Yiddish songs. "That was the only time we felt happy being Jewish."

When her family moved to Indianapolis, Ind., when she was 16, however, "the world opened up. I became active in the Reform Jewish community and worked hard on Refusenik issues. I developed a deep interest in Judaism."

But going to rabbinical school "was not an overnight decision. There were bits and pieces of me that were getting organized for the huge decision."

From university, she went on to become a family and marriage therapist. "During therapy, I would practice the systems theory, in which we bring everyone involved in our lives into the therapy process.

"By bringing God into the system as well, we were including a silent party that was not silent at all. The therapy took on another dimension; it became spiritual."

They discovered in the session that being spiritual was one of the main keys to wellness, she said. "When we describe God, we describe community, ethics, and silence and voice. It is a connection to anyone's deep roots."

Gradually, Rabbi Grimberg said, "what was lying deep within me surfaced. I realized that every step was building up to the decision [to attend rabbinical school].

"I was committed to the community, committed to Jewish learning, and committed to my relationship with the Divine. I wanted to become part of the vibrant Jewish tradition and give it to others," she said.

She attended Hebrew Union College-Jewish Institute of Learning in New York, and began working as an intern at Temple Beth Elohim in Brooklyn as an intern, where she remained after she was ordained.

It was a difficult decision to leave, she said, but her fiancé, Moshe Shizgal, lives in Toronto, and they decided to live here after they were married this past June.

"It was a choice between two loves, and it was a choice of faith. It was similar to the choice I had made when deciding to attend rabbinical school; this was new, but the depth of my knowledge was old."

Rabbi Grimberg says she finds it an easy transition to move from a Reform to a Reconstructionist synagogue "because both are liberal strands of Judaism, both allow the full inclusion of women into Judaism, both are open to questions and both are open to looking at Judaism as a developing force, not a stagnant tradition."

She is eagerly looking forward to becoming part of the Darchei Noam community. "It is a great group of people. They have a casualness and a spirit about them that I enjoy."

She intends for her first sermon to be "open and honest; it's about moving here and moving on. Through this sermon, I want to connect with the congregation. I will also emphasize the significance of this time of year. We need to talk about Sept. 11 and we need to talk about Israel."

As a rabbi, she says, she learns more from her congregants than she learns anywhere else. "In the end, they are the living Torah. They have the questions and the answers. Their life stories are complicated. My goal is to keep my door open, make traditions accessible and inspire the community.

"Rabbis are like conductors; they cannot conduct without a symphony. Similarly, a rabbi needs a community to be a rabbi."

She also plans to make time for her new husband. "A rabbi should be a model for a balanced life, where family is the most important element. What kind of model would I offer to my congregants if I were a dedicated rabbi, but had no time for my family?

"I plan on doing my job as if it is the most important job in the world, but I cannot take on too many roles.

"We cannot be passionately involved in life if we are everything to everybody. We must limit our roles, but perform the roles we do take on well."

York U prof quits journal after Israeli academics fired

By ANNA MORGAN
Staff Reporter

York University translation professor Candace Séguinot has resigned in protest from the editorial board of The Translator, a British scholarly journal whose owner fired two Israeli professors as part of a European and American academic boycott of Israel.

In April, petitions calling for a boycott of Israeli universities and cultural and scientific bodies appeared in two European newspapers – the Guardian in London and Libération in Paris – to protest Israel's treatment of the Palestinians.

In June, as part of the campaign, Tel Aviv University professor Gideon Toury was fired from the advisory board of Translation Studies Abstracts and Prof. Miriam Shlesinger of Bar Ilan University was dismissed from the editorial board of The Translator by Mona Baker, the owner and editor of both journals.

Séguinot opposed to academic boycott

Séguinot said that Baker, an Egyptian-born lecturer in linguistics at the University of Manchester Institute of Science and Technology, began the journals with her own money and has made them the "two top journals in her field."

But the York University professor questions Baker's decision to implement what Séguinot calls a discriminatory policy, without any democratic input from the boards of the two journals.

In her June letter of resignation, Séguinot said that if she had known "that members of the boards could be appointed, excluded, or dismissed on the basis of their race, creed, or nationality, I would not have agreed to serve."

Furthermore, she said it is indefensible to limit the transmission of ideas, adding that "it is important to have issues presented in order to be able to respond to them."

Séguinot said both Toury and Shlesinger are respected scholars in their fields and were fired on the basis of their nationality.

Baker has reportedly said that Toury and Shlesinger's universities, not their nationality, prompted her decision.

Baker had signed a petition urging academics not "to co-operate with official Israeli institutions, including universities," but to "continue to collaborate with, and host, Israeli scientific colleagues on an individual basis."

Baker was on holiday and unavailable to comment by The CJN's deadline.

Shlesinger is a peace and human rights activist who chaired Amnesty International in Israel from 1993 to 1994 and then headed the Adam Institute for Democracy and Peace, an Israeli human rights group involved in instilling fundamental notions of democracy to schoolchildren, from 1994 to 1997.

Several of the journals' board members have resigned in protest over the firings.

In addition, the International Federation of Translators and the European Society for Translation Studies have issued statements denouncing the moves against the two Israeli professors.

Séguinot said that while she does not support what she calls Israel's hard-line policies against the Palestinians, she is convinced an academic boycott merely strengthens the right-wing point of view in Israel.

Neither of the two Israeli academics have cancelled their subscriptions to the journal.

In an interview, Shlesinger said she does not believe in boycotts or in counter-boycotts and that it would be inappropriate to respond to a wrong with a wrong.

A petition opposing the boycott signed and circulated by North American and European academics argues that such moratoriums on contacts with Israel are not only discriminatory, but counter-productive, because they reinforce the perception that Israelis must fend for themselves.

The anti-boycott petition also states that these kinds of campaigns send the message to the non-compromising Palestinian community that their strategy of violence is bearing fruit.

Clarification please, Mr. Ombudsman

According to Reports

By PAUL MICHAELS

In reporting on the horrific terrorist attacks – especially the July 31 attack at Hebrew University and the August 4 bus bombing near Safed – most media outlets refused to identify the perpetrators as terrorists, choosing the term "militants" instead.

Previous columns have dealt with this omission when it comes to Israel. But since the issue of terrorism and the language used to describe it – or more frequently evade it – is so controversial, it is important to revisit the subject.

Last year Tony Burman, CBC's head of news and current affairs, explained the network's refusal to use the "T-word": "It is the practice of CBC News in our on-air presentation to avoid the use of the word 'terrorist' or 'terrorism' and other terms where there is widespread disagreement among Canadians about their meaning. Our role is to report and describe, not to judge."

It is unclear which "widespread disagreement among Canadians" regarding terrorism Burman was referring to. Even CBC's Mideast correspondent, Neil Macdonald, said in a radio interview that "a reasonable definition of 'terrorist,' for example, would be someone who uses violence against civilians, deliberately targets civilians to advance a political agenda" (This Morning, April 25, 2001).

Yet, except for one brief lapse last Sept. 11, Macdonald refuses to apply the term "terrorists" to Palestinians who attack Israeli civilians. He argues that doing so would show favour to Israel's political agenda and would also compel him to "judge" Israeli authorities to be "war criminals." This implies, absurdly, a factual and moral equivalence between Palestinians who deliberately target civilians and Israel's accidental killing of Palestinian civilians when it goes after terrorists.

In his July 19 National Post opinion piece, "Palestinian terrorists? Not on CBC," York University professor Eric Lawee precisely dissected CBC's logical and moral incoherence on this issue. According to Lawee, CBC ombudsman David Bazay spelled out explicitly what Macdonald only implies: "Bazay states that to insist that the CBC should speak of Palestinian terrorism amounts to asking the public broadcaster 'to take sides and to embrace the Israeli government's position on terrorism, which denies the legitimacy of Palestinian resistance.'"

Is the CBC ombudsman rationalizing murderous attacks on Israeli civilians as "justified resistance"? It is hard to believe that any right-thinking individual, let alone an executive at the CBC, could endorse such a repellent view. Clarification from the CBC is certainly in order.

Montreal teenager cycles across U.S. for cancer

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

David Shahmoon could have flown from Baltimore to San Francisco in a few hours. Instead, he rode his bike. It took 58 days.

Shahmoon, 17, a Montrealer studying at Johns Hopkins University, was the youngest member of Hopkins 4K for Cancer, a cross-America bicycle trip that raised $41,000 (US) for the American Cancer Society. The group of 24 young men and women covered 3,800 miles in two months this summer, travelling a route that included major cities and the tiniest towns, mountains and desert, pristine national parks and the backwoods.

They averaged 75 miles a day.

They stayed in YMCAs, churches and campgrounds, and survived mainly on donated food. For Shahmoon, the only participant who keeps kosher, this meant living on a lot of canned tuna and beans.

The bicycle trek was organized by Johns Hopkins students and supervised along the way by two of the university's administrators who rode in a minivan that accompanied the group.

Shahmoon said he was in shape, but not particularly athletic before the trip. His "training" consisted of riding along the Lachine Canal for three or four days beforehand.

He felt his lack of preparation when they hit the first mountains in the Appalachians of Pennsylvania. He admitted that he had to walk up part of the way.

By the time, they hit the Rockies four or five weeks later, Shahmoon had found his legs. The most challenging part was climbing 20 miles uphill to reach the summit of the Rocky Mountain National Park in Colorado at 12,000 feet.

"There were thunderstorms and hail, but you felt like you were on the top of the world," he said.

Temperatures through the desert of Nevada reached 100 degrees, he said. "But it was a dry heat. The wind cools you off when you are riding. I found it tougher to cycle in Montreal on a humid day when I came back."

David Shahmoon comes to the end of the road 12,000 feet above sea level in the Rockies.

Most of the time, though, it was simply a question of keeping on pedalling.

Cycling was not permitted on the interstate highways, so much of the route took the cyclists through out of the way towns that were little more than widenings in the road.

"There were three other Jews in the group and sometimes we would joke that this was more Jews than this place had ever seen," he said.

The group was big news for the media in the little towns and they were interviewed for the morning television show in San Francisco. Each participant had to find $2,500 in sponsorship at the outset, and money was collected on the way.

The effort was made easier by the fact that the group was riding top-flight road bikes designed by former Tour de France champion Greg Lemond, which were sold to the group at cost. Shahmoon went through three sets of tires and 10 to 15 inner tubes. (He lost count.)

"One thing you learn is how to fix a bicycle," he said.

The route was not as the crow flies. From Baltimore, it went northwest through Pennsylvania, Ohio, Indiana and Chicago; then south to St. Louis, Mo., Kansas and Nebraska; west to Colorado and the Rockies; and then through Utah, Nevada and Yosemite National Park, before reaching San Francisco.

The only significant mishap occurred to one of the riders just 10 minutes from the finishing line at the Golden Gate Bridge. That rider could not complete the trip.

It was the cause as much as the challenge that attracted Shahmoon. He considers the highlight of the trip a visit to a hospice in Topeka, Kan., where he met with terminally ill cancer patients. "It was very moving to sit and talk with them. It was uplifting. Here were people who are almost at the end and still have so much life."

Shahmoon also observed how diverse America was, not only geographically, but also in terms of its people. In places like Nebraska people were friendly and waved to them. In Colorado, for example, people were much more blasé.

Among the group itself, strong friendships were formed, he said.

Shahmoon went directly to Johns Hopkins last year after graduating from Herzliah High School (Snowdon). He has been in general studies and still has not made up his mind what to concentrate on during his sophomore year. "Every subject I've taken has interested me," he said.

Shahmoon, whose parents are Barbara and Sassoon, said he wanted to go to university away from home right after high school in order to become independent.

The experience of successfully completing something so arduous has been an important lesson, he said. "It made me understand that if I believe in myself, I can achieve what I want to do. Until this opportunity came, I never would have thought I could cycle almost 4,000 miles, but once your mind is set, nothing can hold you back."

The cyclists have a Web site with more details about the journey at www.hopkins4k.org.

Giuliani calls Arafat an 'obstacle' to peace

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

The United States is making a "mistake" in continuing to negotiate with Yasser Arafat because the Palestinian leader has not only failed to keep his pledge to stop terrorism, he is fostering it, former New York City mayor Rudolph Giuliani said recently in Montreal.

He also said a Palestinian state under Arafat's leadership would be "another place to harbour terrorism... Whether Arafat is assisting terrorists or can't control them, the result is the same."

Instead, the United States should insist that the Palestinians first put into place at least the beginnings of a democracy, with open elections, a free economy and respect for human rights. Until then, he said, the United States should treat those who share its democratic values differently from those who don't.

Israel is "the only absolutely reliable friend of the U.S." in the Middle East, Giuliani told an audience of close to 2,000 at Place des Arts. The event was a fund-raiser for the Hillel Jewish Student Centres and the Canadian Italian Business and Professional Association.

"Arafat should have been gone a long time ago. It's beyond doubt that he is as obstacle to peace... He's useless to the process, he's undermining it. That was clear to me two or three years ago," Giuliani said.

U.S. policy-makers have "romanticized" Arafat to the point of losing the "common sense" to recognize that if someone repeatedly does not keep his word, the person should be dumped.

Giuliani said his opinion of Arafat was formed back when he was a U.S. attorney investigating the 1985 murder of disabled American tourist Leon Klinghoffer by Palestinian terrorists who hijacked the Achille Lauro cruise ship.

Giuliani said he found Arafat to be complicit in the Klinghoffer murder and numerous others.

"It's absurd that our government helped Arafat win the Nobel Peace Prize," he said.

In 1995, Giuliani was roundly criticized by then-president Bill Clinton and The New York Times for having Arafat removed from a concert in celebration of the United Nations' 50th anniversary at Avery Fisher Hall, to which the city had invited world leaders.

"I had specifically not invited him and six or seven other people I didn't like. But he got a ticket from someone else. I asked my chief of staff to throw him out on the premise that he had no right to be there," said Giuliani.

Giuliani has no regrets, even though he was accused of "creating an international incident."

Giuliani was hailed by the sponsors of the Montreal event as a role model for young people because of his calm leadership during the post-Sept. 11 crisis.

He spoke for about 45 minutes without notes and without using the lectern that had been set up for him.

He began by thanking Canada for being the most supportive of any country after the tragedy.

Giuliani said that in the immediate aftermath of the attacks on the World Trade Center, he looked for strength from the experience of two peoples whom he had admired for their fortitude in the face of attack: the English during the Blitz and, more recently, the Israelis.

Americans, like the English and Israelis, were attacked for their belief in freedom and equality, and the fear that those ideals will spread, he said.

"They hate us for that. They know that if people [get a taste of freedom], they will overthrow the dictators. They were so frightened of that, they had to attack us."

Leadership in a time of crisis takes courage, he said, but that does not mean the absence of fear. "Having no fear in a dangerous situation is insanity.

"Courage is managing your fear in order to do what you think your obligations are."

Giuliani first realized the enormity of Sept. 11 when he saw someone jump from the 101st floor of the first tower. "It was a surreal experience," he said. "I knew we were in uncharted territory and I said to the police chief we will have to make up a response."

Later, though, he realized the city was better prepared than he had initially thought. The emergency measures that had been rehearsed many times for suicide bombings, biological attacks and plane crashes helped a great deal, he said.

"I like to make quick decisions by instinct, which is good in a crisis. But that can be bad, so I surround myself with people who take time to think things over."

Straightforward communication is also a mark of leadership, he said. "You can't be a leader if you don't explain yourself... People may agree with you or not – that is what a free society is about – but they will respect you.

"Scripted, canned responses only undermine people's confidence."

Despite the horrible events of Sept. 11, Giuliani remains convinced the world is still a better place than in the past. "It's safer, there are more opportunities, better health care and financial security...

"The great leaders are not pessimists; writers, artists, actors may be, but who is going to follow anyone into doom and destruction?"

As he learned from the mother of a firefighter who was killed Sept. 11, people "have to force themselves to go forward and enjoy the beautiful things in life."

Proceeds from the Montreal event will be shared by the two sponsoring organization and go toward bursaries and other student activities. A portion will also be donated to the Twin Towers Fund of New York.

Cotler criticizes omissions in terrorist list

By DAVID LAZARUS
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Mount Royal MP Irwin Cotler says his own government's unwillingness to list Hamas, Islamic Jihad and Hezbollah as terrorist groups is "an affront to the moral, juridical, diplomatic and political struggle against terrorism."

In a recent statement, he said, "Simply put, this 'list of terrorist entities' undermines our counter-terrorism law and policy, both domestically and internationally."

Last month, Canada's solicitor-general, Lawrence MacAulay, announced "further action against terrorism" by listing seven "entities" that Canada now officially considers terrorist based on the criteria of Bill C-36, the Anti-Terrorism Act.

The list included Al Qaeda and other Islamic groups, but made no mention of equally notorious terrorist organizations responsible for most, if not all, of the suicide bombings in Israel.

"The list... is seriously flawed and deficient," Cotler said in a response statement issued the same day MacAulay's list was published.

"In particular, it does not include major terrorist groups such as Hamas, Islamic Jihad and Hezbollah, who have patented what I have referred to as 'genocidal bombing' – terrorist suicide bombings that, by the terrorists' own covenant, call publicly for the destruction of Israel and the killing of Jews wherever they may be."

Others joining in the criticism were the Simon Wiesenthal Center (SWC) and Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC).

SWC founder Marvin Hier urged Prime Minister Jean Chrétien to include Hamas in its listings of terrorist groups as have Germany and the United States.

Not doing so, Hier wrote, "offers them undeserved legitimacy and weakens your country's commitment to the war on international terrorism."

CJC president Keith Landy wrote to MacAulay to express his "dismay" over the omissions.

"What is particularly perplexing is that the list contained not one of the internationally known groups engaged in the long-standing concerted and murderous campaign of terrorism against Israel and its citizens," he wrote.

"We implore you to broaden the register of named terrorist organizations forthwith, and to ensure that the major anti-Israel terrorist groups are included in the first supplementary list."

In an interview with The CJN, Cotler also said he hoped MacAulay would include the omitted terrorist names in the next list.

"It would be unacceptable otherwise," he said.

Cotler said the only possible reason he could think of for their exclusion was that they have some perceived "generic connection" with Al Qaeda.

Cotler said the list contradicted statements made previously by his government inside and outside the House of Commons over the years by former foreign minister John Manley and current Foreign Minister Bill Graham.

"It undercuts the government's own counter-terrorism law and policy which seeks to prohibit the preparation, financing, facilitating and perpetration of acts of terrorism – and the prohibiting of those terrorist entities engaged in such acts of terrorism," Cotler said.

In his statement, Cotler also referred to the omissions as a "breach of our undertaking under UN Security Council Resolution 1373 to designate such terrorist groups on a list of terrorist entities, so as to prevent and prohibit any affiliation i Canada with them."

Moreover, the failure to include the above-cited groups also a "breach of our commitments under international co ventions against terrorist bombing and financing," Cotler sai

Cotler said even though Hamas, Islamic Jihad and th military wing of Hezbollah are listed in both UN and Canadia cabinet anti-terrorism regulations as organization whose asse can be frozen by virtue of their terrorist activities, "they are di turbingly and conspicuously absent from this list."

And the absence of the names on the list, he said, could lea people to conclude that Canada does not consider them terro ist entities.

Montreal-based, pro-Israel 'e-zine' has global reach

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

Every day, almost 12,000 people around the world receive a four-page e-mail of current articles on the Middle East reprinted from the international press and scholarly journals.

Many others receive the selection of articles by fax. In addition, 2,000 people get a weekly French version.

The origin of their mail is an office at a confidential downtown Montreal location.

Isranet Daily Briefing is a free service of the Canadian Institute for Jewish Research (CIJR), an independent Israel advocacy organization founded 14 years ago by Concordia University professor Frederick Krantz.

Isranet was launched after the start of the second intifadah in the fall of 2000 in order to disseminate articles that support Israel. Since then, its circulation has grown exponentially, said Krantz, the organization's director.

"We are unique in Canada, the only Israel-centred magazine published here," he said.

"The Internet has made us an international media source, a sort of clearing house for good, thoughtful writing," Krantz said. "Our actual readership is probably at least double the 12,000 recipients because many people forward Isranet to others. We get comments from people in Europe, Israel, Australia, all over – anywhere from 75 to 200 responses a day."

Isranet is produced five days a week on a shoestring budget, with a staff of just 2½ people, plus one part-timer, two or three student "interns" who receive an honorarium and a half-dozen volunteers.

Each day, the team goes through stacks of Canadian, American, Israeli and English-language Arab newspapers, magazines such as the New Republic and Commentary, major journals on the Middle East, and a wide variety of documents from think-tanks and government sources.

Members of its academic advisory board often pass along items of interest they come across in small-circulation periodicals.

Then the articles, sometimes edited, are entered into CIJR's computer system. Isranet can also be read online at www.isranet.org.

A recent issue contained two translated poems from Al-Watan, an Arabic-language weekly newspaper for Arab-Americans. One was titled "Yes, I am a Terrorist," an anti-West diatribe; the other, a derogatory reference to U.S. President George W. Bush, was called "The Ape."

The hardest part of the job, said volunteer research director Baruch Cohen, is selecting from a wealth of material the few articles needed to fit the four-page format. Issues are occasionally expanded to five or six pages when warranted.

Because Isranet receives so many responses, it now publishes readers' comments in a special issue once a month.

But not all of the feedback is positive, especially from the Arab community.

"Some are angry, some are hostile. We have had death threats. That's why we only publish a post-office box address."

Though CIJR publishes articles that argue the 1993 Oslo accords were a mistake, Krantz insists that an effort is made to present different points of view.

"We try to be analytical and objective," he said.

Recently, he said, Isranet began publishing original material from readers.

"These articles are some times picked up by other Web sites and credited to us."

In addition to the French version, which is a recent innovation, CIJR hopes to start a Spanish weekly version, aimed at the half-million Jews living in Latin America, he said. Another goal is to run a longer Isranet weekly on the Web site.

While the majority of recipients receive Isranet at their request, CIJR also sends it to various influential leaders such as every Quebec MNA and every federal MP.

Costs are kept down because CIJR does not have to pay the publications whose articles it uses, as long as they are clearly attributed, Krantz said. It also does not remunerate readers who write original pieces.

"They seem to be happy that we are using their stuff. It gives them tremendous exposure."

Despite its success with Isranet, CIJR still scrambles for money. "We raise every dollar ourselves, and have no foundation to speak of."

Its main annual fund-raiser, a cocktail reception, is being held Aug. 15 at the Laurentian home of Judy and Amos Sochaczevski. The guest speaker is Benny Morris, a professor of Middle East history at Ben-Gurion University of the Negev. His topic will be Arafat, Camp David and the Failure of Middle East Peacemaking.

individuals and prominent businessmen and academics. In addition, such figures as Montreal Mayor Gérald Tremblay and Quebec International Relations Minister Louise Beaudoin have sent Peres requests to reconsider.

(Peres has also faced protests from other Jewish communities whose diplomatic missions are facing closure, such as Sydney, Australia, and Rio de Janeiro.)

In addition to Bronfman, local figures involved in lobbying to keep the consulate open have included Senator Leo Kolber, FEDERATION CJA president Steven Cummings and, according to one source, Rabbi Reuben Poupko.

The Jewish community went through a similar ordeal four years ago. At that time, Bronfman also intervened to keep the consulate open.

D.C. Ladies really cook together

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

The D.C. Ladies have proven that the group that eats together stays together.

The nine women and their husbands have met monthly for social activities for about 15 years, but according to Gloria Clamen and Karen Cohen, "it is food that knits us together. We all love to eat and we all love to cook.

"We discuss recipes, we talk about food, and we sometimes cook together. If we don't have another activity planned, we often make a dinner."

This interest in food is inspirational, said Clamen. "There are two of us at home now and we don't cook much, but I'm always looking for new recipes, and for people to try them out on. This group gives me the opportunity."

It is out of this shared passion for food that the group – named for one of its members when he quickly needed a group name to make a reservation – came up with the Ess Mein Kinder Cookbook, a compilation of members' favourite recipes, now in its 10th edition.

The seeds for the book were planted after the women made a bridal shower for the future daughter-in-law of one of the members.

"We decided to create a cookbook as a keepsake for the bride. We all contributed a recipe, and the book was named in the bride's honour. We handed it out to everyone at the shower, and it was an instant hit," said Clamen.

So much so, she said, that each time a member's child gets married, they create another cookbook for the bride.

"Guests, who include the bride's family and all our 'former' brides, are always surprised and pleased to come away with this loot bag. In addition, we will fax them the recipes of anything we serve at the shower," said Cohen.

The cookbooks, she said, are an eclectic mix of recipes. "There are no rules except that the recipes be kosher. There are some traditional, some low fat and some for Passover. It is one of my daughter's favourite cookbooks."

The best thing, Clamen said, is that there are at least 22 more cookbooks to come.

The following Ess Mein Kinder recipes will be a welcome addition to your holiday table.

LUCILLE WINTER'S CRANBERRY GLAZED TURKEY

3-3½-lb. turkey breast, bone in
1 can (14 oz.) cranberry sauce
¼ cup brown sugar
¼ cup soy sauce
juice from ½ lemon
1 tsp. ginger powder
1 tsp. dry mustard
1 garlic clove, large, chopped
salt & pepper to taste

Clean breast (remove skin and fat) and place in greased baking dish (coat with non-stick spray). Lightly salt and pepper the turkey.

Combine cranberry sauce, sugar, soy sauce, lemon juice, ginger, mustard and garlic in a saucepan. Put about half the sauce over the turkey breast. Roast in oven, uncovered, at 325 for 1½ hours, basting occasionally. Warm the rest of the sauce on the stove before serving. (Serve separately in sauce boat). Remove from oven and cover. Let stand for 10 to 15 minutes before cutting. May be served with stuffing, potatoes, yams and/or cooked greens.

BARRY'S TRADITIONAL SPLIT PEA SOUP
(From Lucille Winter)

1 cup split green peas (mixed with yellow optional)
¼ cup baby lima beans
1 medium clove garlic, finely sliced
4 large carrots, cut into ¼-in. pieces
1 medium cooking onion, coarsely chopped
1 cup diced celery (preferably with greens)
½ cup sliced mushrooms
3 tsp. pareve chicken stock mix
½ tsp. salt
¼ tsp. freshly ground pepper
dash of tabasco (optional)

In a large pot, bring seven cups of water to a rapid boil. Add salt, pepper, stock mix, garlic, split peas and lima beans.

Boil rapidly for 10 minutes, stirring occasionally. Simmer covered for four hours, stirring occasionally. Add celery, carrots, onion and mushrooms and reduce heat to simmer.

For dairy meal, may be topped with ground cheese. Freezes well.

KAREN COHEN'S OVEN-ROASTED VEGGIES

1 whole garlic bulb, separated into cloves, peeled
3 sweet potatoes, cut in chunks
3 zucchini, sliced thick (optional)
1-2 eggplants, cut in chunks (optional)
1 lb. green beans
8-10 mushrooms
2 green peppers
2 red peppers
2 red onions, quartered
¼ cup olive oil

Preheat oven to 375. Arrange vegetables in large baking pan in a single layer. Drizzle with oil and sprinkle with whole garlic, salt, pepper, onion powder, oregano and basil. Use lots of spice. Bake uncovered one hour (if brown too quickly, take out early).

Arrange on glass plate according to colours. Serve slightly warm or at room temperature. Before serving, may be drizzled with balsamic vinegar.

GLORIA CLAMEN'S FRUITY KASHA

2 tbsp. salad oil
1 cup roasted whole kasha
1½ cups broth (chicken or vegetable)
¾ cup chopped dried apricots
1 medium red apple, cored, diced
¼ cup chopped roasted cashews
¼ cup raisins
orange vinaigrette (below)
mandarin orange segments

In a 2-3-qt. pan, combine oil and kasha and stir over medium heat until lightly toasted (4-5 min.). Add broth, cover pan and cook over low heat just until kasha is tender and liquid is absorbed (10-15 min.) Do not stir. Remove lid and cool for 30 min. Do not stir. Add apricots, apple, cashews, raisins and vinaigrette; mix gently. Place in shallow service dish and garnish the rim with orange segments.

Orange Vinaigrette

Mix 1 tsp. grated orange peel, ½ cup orange juice, ¼ cup salad oil, 1 tbsp. cider vinegar, 1 tsp. honey.

Essays explore Jews' role in Berlin's awakening

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

A backwater in the 18th century, Berlin evolved into an international city in the late 19th century.

In the process, it became a centre of radical ideas in the visual, performing and literary arts. Jews played a major role in nurturing this cosmopolitan awakening.

Berlin Metropolis: Jews and the New Culture, 1890-1918, published by the University of California Press, examines this flourishing avant-garde period through the medium of nine erudite essays by leading scholars in the field.

Lavishly illustrated, it was issued to coincide with a recent exhibition on Berlin and modernism at the Jewish Museum in New York.

The figures profiled include theatre director Max Reinhardt, film director Ernst Lubitsch, and publisher Herwarth Walden.

The culture of modernism promoted by these and other Jewish Berliners was demonized by the Nazis as "degenerate." But today it is hailed as a path-breaking development of no small importance.

Emily Bilski's essay puts the topic in perspective.

She explains that the emancipation of German Jewry was slow and gradual, and that Jews were still excluded from certain sectors of society: the royal court, the military, the state bureaucracy and, to a large degree, universities.

More or less denied access to these spheres, Jews gravitated to the free professions and to the arts, where they excelled.

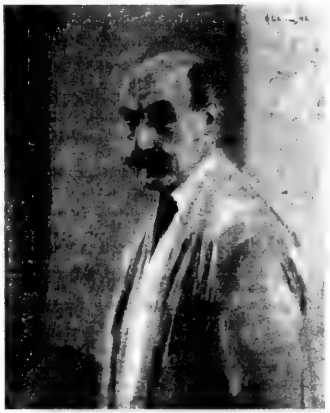
Paul Mendes-Flohr points out that the "romance" of Jews with German culture provoked an anti-Semitic reaction. He uses Werner Sombart, the social and economic historian, as an example of the backlash.

Prefiguring the Nazis, Sombart claimed that Jews were an incorrigibly alien element bent on subverting the culture and life of the native population.

In his essay, Peter Paret elaborates upon this theme, dwelling on the activities of the anti-Semitic publicist Philipp Stauff.

Sigrid Bauschinger writes about Jewish literary figures, from novelists to critics, who discovered and encouraged innovative artists.

In another essay, Bilski analyzes the four most prominent Jewish artists of the epoch: Max Liebermann, Lesser Ury, Ludwig Meidner and Jakob Steinhardt.



Max Liebermann's self portait

Chana Schultz focuses on Liebermann, who was instrumental in advancing the breakthrough of Impressionism in Wilhelmine Germany. The founder of the Berlin Secession movement, which broke with official academic art, Liebermann was president of the Prussian Academy of Arts from 1920 to 1932.

Inka Bertz zeroes in on the cultural movement that attempted to blend Zionism, Jewish tradition and modernity, and naturally enough, she deals at length with philosopher Martin Buber.

Barbara Hahn takes a close look at that peculiar institution, the Jewish salon in Berlin, and one of the hostesses she describes is Babette Meyer, the scion of a banking family.

Peter Jelavich's essay on Jews in theatre, cabaret and film concentrates on, among others, Otto Brahm and Reinhardt.

This stimulating collection of essays sheds light on an era of accomplishment and underscores the tremendous impact Jews once exerted on German culture.

Tanz! among re-issued classic klezmer albums

By ERIC STEIN
Special to The CJN

Need a healthy dose of klezmer music to nourish your Yiddish neshama? Can't wait for the Ashkenaz Festival? Well, you're in luck.

Columbia/Legacy Records has just re-issued three great CDs of Yiddish music from the first half of the last century that are sure to appeal to both klezmer aficionados and neophytes.

Abe Schwartz: The Klezmer King is a beautifully produced CD of 25 rare songs from 1917-1935. This CD is long overdue. Despite being the most prolific klezmer recording artist of the 1920s and the most important bandleader of the early American klezmer scene, Schwartz has not received the attention he deserves as a true giant of the genre.

Schwartz may not have been the best violinist, but he was an efficient organizer and effective arranger. Signed by Columbia in 1917, Schwartz led more than 75 Jewish recording sessions over two decades, and his bands launched the careers of klezmer legends Naftule Brandwein, Shloimke Beckerman, and Dave Tarras.

What is so amazing about this CD is how fresh and innovative many of the tracks still sound. Despite being anchored firmly in an old-world klezmer sound, Schwartz's arranging was at times highly sophisticated and he always seemed to get the most out of his musicians. Many of the recordings crackle with inventiveness and sheer virtuosity.

It is also remarkable to hear the often ingenious ways that Schwartz introduced light touches of Americana into his music, helping to bridge Klezmer from old world to new.

One piece from 1928, Die Reize Nuch Amerika (The Trip to America), seems distinctly inspired by John Philip Sousa's marches. Another song, Der Automobile (1923), features Morris Goldstein's humorous Yiddish vocals lamenting the challenges of living in America's emerging consumer culture :"Not everyone can own one/ Imagine how they feel/ To be too poor to afford/ To ride in an automobile".

Overall, this Abe Schwartz retrospective is quality listening for just about anyone. Moreover, it provides unique insight into the transformation klezmer underwent in America during the 1920s, and spotlights many of the most significant American klezmorim at developmental stages in their careers. It also highlights the important role Schwartz played in the early American klezmer scene.

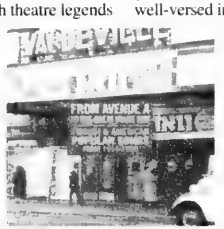
An appropriate companion to the Schwartz CD is From Avenue A to the Great White Way: Yiddish and American Popular Songs, 1914-1950. This double CD set features mostly Yiddish theatre, vaudeville and novelty songs that hark back to the golden age of American radio and stage.

There are performances in both English and Yiddish by such Jewish "crossover" stars as Sophie Tucker, Al Jolson, Eddie Cantor, Irving Berlin, and Benny Goodman. In these songs, Jewish music mingles with Tin Pan Alley, jazz, samba, foxtrot, and other styles. They are matched on the CD with more heimish cuts from Yiddish theatre legends such as Aaron Lebedeff, Seymour Rechtseit and Molly Picon.



Some of the material borders on kitsch, with titles like That's Yiddisha Jazz, The Sheik of Avenue B and Matzoh Balls. Nonetheless, the songs are interesting and important musical documents that demonstrate how Jewish musical influences were seeping into American musical culture (check out Cab Calloway's amazing rendition of Ot Azoy Nit der Shnayderl).

The gem of these re-issues is undoubtedly the long-overdue re-release of Tanz!, a landmark 1956 LP by American klezmer legends Dave Tarras and Sam Musiker. This is American klezmer music at its highest stage of development, just before its decline into near extinction.

Tanz! was a revolutionary record in its day. Tightly arranged and orchestrated by Musiker, Tanz! achieved highly sophisticated fusions of Yiddish and klezmer with jazzy American musical aesthetics. It was arguably the first klezmer "concept" album, and many contend it is the greatest klezmer record of all time.

The playing is absolutely amazing, with the strong ensemble group making the most of Musiker's brilliant arrangements. Solo excursions by the co-leaders verify their status as the leading klezmer clarinet players of their day.

The elder Tarras shines on his Roumanian Fantasy suite, while the protegé Musiker wrenches every bit of emotion out of a beautiful improvisation on Der Neier Doina, proving himself every bit the equal of his mentor (and father-in-law) Tarras.

By the 1950s, Tarras represented the old-school of American klezmorim, but the younger and lesser-known Musiker (who had done stints in Gene Krupa's band) was at the vanguard of an emerging brand of American-Jewish musician, well-versed in jazz and complex orchestration but also fluent in Jewish music.

Musiker's career was cut short by his premature death from heart failure in 1964. Had he lived on, there is no telling where he might have led the evolution of klezmer music. He was the archetype of the later klezmer revivalists, combining klezmer vocabulary with American music and developing an evolutionary mainstream style rooted in Jewish music.

Tanz! is a must-have for music fans of any stripe. This is exciting music that sparkles with originality and virtuosity. The original disc has been beautifully re-mastered and comes with two previously unreleased takes and excellent detailed notes about the making of the record.

Matched with the Schwartz CD, listeners will get a crash course in the evolution of klezmer in the first half of the 20th century.

Eric Stein is a member of Toronto klezmer band Beyond the Pale.

Israel tells U.S. it will respond to Iraqi strike

By ALUF BENN and AMOS HAREL
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Israel has notified the United States that it will respond to any Iraqi attack, even if there are no Israeli casualties, Ha'aretz has learned.

Senior Israeli officials have explained to their American counterparts that it is important to Israel to maintain its deterrence, and that it would not practise the same kind of restraint it demonstrated in the Gulf War in 1991. The Americans empathized with the Israeli position, but said that if there are no casualties, Israel should make do with a symbolic response.

Israel and the United States have not yet held systematic consultations in preparation for a possible U.S. attack on Iraq, which would be designed to change the regime there. But the question of Israel's intervention in the war has been discussed in various meetings, and Prime Minister Ariel Sharon has told U.S. President George W. Bush that if Israel is attacked, it will respond.

According to senior Israeli sources, the United States would prefer for Israel to stay out, and will therefore do its utmost to keep Iraq from attacking Israel.

In 1991, the United States led a coalition that included several Arab countries, like Saudi Arabia, Egypt and Syria. The Americans believed the coalition would fall apart if Israel responded to an Iraqi attack. This time, America does not have Arab and European support from the outset, but Washington is still concerned that even the appearances of collaboration with Israel would badly affect its relations with Arab allies such as Saudi Arabia and Kuwait.

Israel's defence establishment still has no clear data about the U.S. plans. The working assumption is that the United States will not attack Iraq before the end of the year. The Israeli army is now perfecting the mechanisms that will be used if and when the war starts – early warning, home front command (distribution of gas masks and vaccines) and aerial defense (including the Arrow anti-tactical ballistic missile and the air force).

The air force has already started deploying Arrow missile batteries near Hadera for a two-week drill. Military sources maintain the timing of the drill is not directly related to the expected U.S. attack in Iraq. Air force sources said this deployment had been planned a long time ago and is designed to get the forces accustomed to the equipment and the terrain so that everything would go smoothly in case of emergency.

In the last two years, the residents of the region waged a campaign against the Israel Defence Forces (IDF) and the defense establishment, arguing that a permanent deployment of the batteries there would expose them to dangerous radiation. The parties eventually agreed that the IDF would only deploy there in an emergency.

Senior sources in the defence establishment said Sunday they were expecting a 72-hour warning before the American attack, although Israel has asked to be warned a week ahead of time.

"We do not have an automatic response for every given scenario, but the very statement that Israel will respond this time is important for deterrence," the sources said.

If America allows Israel to respond, tight co-ordination will be required. In 1991, the Americans refused to give Israel the codes that would have enabled the Israeli air force to operate over Iraq without crashing into U.S. aircraft.

Outgoing chief of the Central Command, Maj.-Gen. Yitzhak Eitan, said last weekend that a U.S. attack on Iraq would weaken Palestinian resolve to clash with Israel. The Palestinians depend to a great extent on Iraqi support, and any blow to Iraq would therefore cut into Palestinian resources.

Operation Defensive Shield and other IDF operations in the territories are causing "an earthquake" in the Palestinian Authority, Eitan said. "It is all beneath the surface. There is an internal debate in the territories, and most participants are still not ready to express their opinions in public, but the majority understands that they have lost the campaign [against Israel]."

Maj.-Gen. Moshe Kaplinski (Kaplan) replaced Eitan last week as chief of the Central Command. Kaplinski was Sharon's military secretary over the past year and is considered one of the candidates to become the next chief of staff.

Eitan will use the next few months for rest and studies. He may then be appointed head of the Plans and Policy Directorate.

Pilot in U.S. refuses to let Melchior fly

Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

CINCINNATI — A Delta Air Lines subsidiary refused to fly Israeli Deputy Foreign Minister Michael Melchior from Cincinnati because the pilot thought Melchior posed a security risk, an Israeli radio station reported Sunday.

Melchior, who was being escorted by State Department officials for last Friday's flight, told the radio station that he waited on a plane for more than an hour before the pilot evacuated it, saying there was a security risk.

When Melchior disembarked, he said he was told he could not get back on the plane.

"The security officials and the company all put pressure on him, and there were negotiations," Melchior told Israel Radio. "But the pilot is sovereign on his aircraft, and he is empowered to make such a decision, and he did it in spite of all the pressure from the company and security officials."

He said he flew out on another Delta plane about a half-hour later. The Israeli Embassy in Washington had taken the matter up with the State Department, Melchior said.

This is the third time an Israeli official has been pulled from a flight because of a pilot's sense of a security risk, the radio reported. The others reportedly were Alon Pinkas, the Israeli consul general in New York, and a bodyguard of Israeli Foreign Minister Shimon Peres.

He deplored the "singling out of Israeli diplomats... and removing them from a plane in such a manner."

Atlanta-based Delta, which has a hub in Cincinnati, is the third-biggest U.S. carrier. Delta's corporate communications office was asked to comment, but had not responded at press time.

Israel, Palestinians trade barbs, terrorism continues

By NAOMI SEGAL
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

JERUSALEM — Israel's war on Palestinian terrorism is having mixed results, according to Defence Minister Benjamin Ben-Eliezer.

On Sunday, Ben-Eliezer told cabinet that Israel's new policy of demolishing the homes of terrorists is beginning to have a deterrent effect.

Ben-Eliezer told the ministers that he had seen reports of Palestinian parents attempting to stop their children from carrying out terrorist attacks for fear their homes would be demolished.

Ben-Eliezer said that last week, Israeli forces arrested 25 suspected terrorists and demolished the homes of 17 terrorists.

Just the same, he said, 14 Israelis were killed and 90 wounded by Palestinian terrorists last week.

The night before the cabinet meeting, an Israeli woman, Yafit Herenstein, 31, was killed and her husband, Arno, was moderately wounded in a terrorist infiltration of a West Bank settlement. The couple's two children were unharmed.

In another attack, a Palestinian gunman opened fire Sunday on a group of Israeli road workers near the Jewish settlement of Dugit in northern Gaza.

One Israeli was shot at least five times in the arms and legs, but was reported in stable condition.

Israeli soldiers chased the gunman, who ran into a house in the nearby Palestinian area of Beit Lahiya, the army said. The gunman was killed in an exchange of fire with the soldiers.

The terror was punctuated by angry exchanges by Israeli and Palestinian leaders.

On Sunday, Prime Minister Ariel Sharon told his cabinet that he did not believe Palestinian Authority President Yasser Arafat's regime would take action to halt Palestinian terror attacks.

"Arafat is the head of terrorism, and no one is counting on him," Sharon said.

His comments came as a Palestinian delegation was in Washington, D.C., for discussions with senior Bush administration officials on stabilizing the region and reforming Palestinian security forces.

Palestinian Authority Cabinet Secretary Ahmed Abdel Rahman said Sharon was trying to interfere with the visit of the high-ranking Palestinian delegation to Washington.

Last week, Ben-Eliezer met with Palestinian officials and presented what has come to be known as the "Gaza First" plan.

Under the plan, Israeli soldiers would withdraw from parts of Gaza and the West Bank city of Bethlehem in exchange for Palestinian guarantees that no attacks would be launched from these areas. Further withdrawals would take place if peace holds in these first areas.

On Sunday, Sharon said the positive reaction from some Palestinian officials to the plan was "a trick."

As Israeli and Palestinian officials traded barbs, Ben-Eliezer came under fire from a group of former Israeli security officials who called on him to keep his pledge to dismantle illegal settler enclaves.

In a letter to Israel's defence minister, former officials from the army, police and Shin Bet security service accused Ben-Eliezer of manipulating the situation to serve his own interests within the Labor Party.

"You cannot send us and our sons to protect lawbreakers," the letter said, according to Israel Radio.

In June, Ben-Eliezer said he intended to uproot some 20 unauthorized settler outposts. Several were subsequently taken down.

In related developments, Dafna Shafruch, 61, died Sunday of wounds sustained in the bombing attack at Hebrew University two weeks ago. Shafruch worked as an information systems co-ordinator for the university's Student Authority.

Shafruch had gone for lunch with the head of the Student Authority, Levina Shapira, who was also killed in the attack. Shafruch's colleagues described her as the brains of the Student Authority and said that her death was a great loss to the university. Shafruch is survived by her husband and three children. Two of the wounded from the attack are still in critical condition in hospital.

Dutch tolerance may benefit Muslim extremists

By SHARON SADEH
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

THE HAGUE — The closure of the Al-Aqsa Foundation's offices in Germany last week set Holland's Jewish community in motion.

Last Wednesday Ronny Naftaniel, director of the Centre for Information and Documentation on Israel (CIDI) in The Hague, sent Holland's Justice Ministry an urgent letter, demanding that it investigate the Al-Aqsa group's activity in the country and take steps to close the foundation's offices.

"The Al-Aqsa Foundation operates around Europe, including in the Netherlands and Belgium," Naftaniel explains. He says the head of the foundation in Germany, a Palestinian named Mohammed Amar, also directs a sister branch in Holland whose main office is located in the city of Harlem, which raised 600,000 Euros in 2001 in a campaign focusing on cities with large Muslim populations.

Holland's General Intelligence and Security Service (known as AIVD, from the Dutch acronym) noted in its 2001 report that the Al-Aqsa group raises money for Hamas. But, says AIVD spokesperson Vincent Van Steen, "there is no proof that this money is used for terror activity, since Hamas also directs social and cultural activity."

The Al-Aqsa group's activity in the Netherlands is just the tip of the iceberg. A wide network of activities of extremist Muslims has stirred anxiety among the local Jewish community, as well as security officials and politicians. But a Ha'aretz investigation shows that despite the concern about growing Islamic radicalization, local authorities have yet to come to grips with the dangers posed by the trend. The apparently insufficient response is exemplified by the failure to implement strict security procedures in public venues and the reluctance to legislate specific anti-terror proposals.

Last year, a wealth of accumulated evidence indicated that the country's liberal immigration policy, its strong commitment to individual liberties and its atmosphere of tolerance were being exploited by extremist Muslim activists and terror elements. Police and security officers conducted undercover surveillance of Muslim operatives. They also carried out two raids – in September and April – in which 10 people, nine Algerians and one French citizen, were detained on charges of planning attacks against western targets. Four of them remain in custody, but two weeks ago one suspect escaped from his prison cell, and Dutch authorities are pursuing him.

Another investigation, carried out in co-operation with intelligence officials from the United States and other European countries, has established that the passports used by two suicide strikers who last September murdered Ahmedd Sahah Massoud, an anti-Taliban Afghan leader with the Northern Alliance, were forged in the Netherlands.

A recruitment connection operates freely in the Netherlands, trying to enlist Muslim fighters for the struggle in Kashmir. Recently the bodies of two young men who were killed last January in clashes with Indian troops were returned to Holland. Last week, authorities in Belgium announced that a number of leading members of the Fundamentalist party FIS (which has been banned in Algeria) met secretly in the Netherlands; this disclosure embarrassed Dutch security officials.

When it comes to fighting terror, the hands of law enforcement officials in Holland are technically tied. Despite intra-governmental agreements and accepted joint definitions of terror adopted in an emergency atmosphere by European Union members after the Sept. 11 attacks in the United States, "terrorism" as such is not defined in Dutch legislation. No person can be sentenced in the Netherlands for membership in a terrorist organization or for carrying out terrorist attacks. Persons suspected of such actions are persecuted only for criminal actions normally taken by terrorists such as kidnapping, trespassing, manslaughter or murder.

The AIVD spokesperson denies that this apparent lacuna in Dutch law poses a practical obstacle in the prosecution of terrorists. "Whoever is involved in an act of terror is involved in transgressions of the criminal code," the spokesperson explains.

In Holland, recent months have seen a lively public debate about the activities and ideologies of 700,000 Muslim residents in the country. The debate was sparked by the broadcast of an investigation on the current events television program, Nova. The broadcast featured secret recordings of incendiary sermons given by various imam preachers, condemning Israel, the United States, women and homesexuals.

One of the Muslim clerics called on Allah to "pour out wrath" on U.S. President George W. Bush and Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon; another imam recited verses in praise of Palestinian suicide terrorists. Dutch prosecutors are considering whether indictments can be filed against some of these imams.

In a related development, a new, disturbing AIVD report on Muslim schools in the country has been released. According to the report, the schools, which are partially funded by donations from Libya and Saudi Arabia, indoctrinate students and advocate doctrines that are so extremist that they "might be harmful to the democratic legal order."

Classified documents and security sources indicate that terror organizations in Holland are involved in weapons smuggling, document forgery and illegal transfer of funds.

Plan for Falash Mora immigration

By MAZAL MUALEM
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Under a cloak of secrecy, Shas spiritual leader Rabbi Ovadia Yosef has been forging a plan for the immigration of thousands of Falash Mora Ethiopians with relatives in Israel.

The plan is based on recommendations submitted by Rabbi Yosef's close associate, Tel Aviv Chief Rabbi Shlomo Amar, who travelled secretly to Ethiopia several months ago at the request of Rabbi Yosef and Shas leader Eli Yishai.

Rabbi Amar recommended bringing most of those waiting to immigrate to Israel (22,000 people dwelling in two camps in Addis Ababa and in Gondar) in an accelerated process that would obligate the candidates for immigration to undergo a Jewish training course in Ethiopia. The candidates have been awaiting immigration for the past three years.

According to the plan, Ethiopian rabbis, trained by Rabbi Yosef, would travel to Ethiopia and establish religious institutes in the Addis Ababa and Gondar areas.

The candidates for immigration, who are in fact descendents of Jews, would be required to take a course that lasts a few months about the various laws and customs of the Torah. The plan calls for the immigrants to be imbibed with "the spark of Judaism" so they can come "prepared to Israel."

While in Ethiopia, Rabbi Amar assessed the level of Judaism of the some 22,000 Falash Mora Ethiopians and recommended different methods of dealing with the mass immigration. He stayed with the Falash Mora for a few days and was shocked by their tough living conditions. In a recent meeting with Rabbi Yosef and Yishai, he submitted the findings from investigations he carried out both in Ethiopia and in Israel.

During Rabbi Yosef's term as chief rabbi of Israel, the government officially recognized the Falash Mora's Jewish authenticity. In a Halachic ruling in 1984, Rabbi Yosef in essence paved the way for "Operation Moses," which airlifted 7,000 Ethiopian Jews to Israel that year. He is currently working on a halachic writ, which builds on his 1984 ruling, and will serve as a policy guide for Shas leader Eli Yishai to use in his position as interior minister.

A Jerusalem street bounces back to life

By ESTHER HECHT

David Bilmes hadn't considered the resilience of Jerusalemites when he arrived for a summer sublet in the German Colony, an upscale neighbourhood. Its narrow, tree-lined lanes were as serene and bucolic as he had expected, but the main thoroughfare, Emek Refa'im Street, was hopping.

"We were all surprised at how lively Emek Refa'im is, especially at night," said Bilmes, 45, a schoolteacher from Middlebury, Conn., here with his family for a month of study.

Life in Israel

On a Thursday night in July – Thursday nights are party nights in Israel since most people are off on Friday – traffic was bumper to bumper on Emek Refa'im. Diners and drinkers filled sidewalk tables. At Caffit, the neighbourhood's trendiest café, about 10 people, including a family with young children, waited to get in. Across the street, teenagers crowded around a cell-phone promoter who was giving away glow-in-the dark necklaces.

Had Bilmes arrived in early April, he would have found a totally different scene. A wave of suicide attacks throughout March that killed 26 and wounded more than 200 in the capital, had left residents wary of entering any public place. Not only the city centre, where most of the attacks had occurred, became nearly deserted. Emek Refa'im, with its yuppie boutiques and more than two dozen restaurants, cafés, bars and fast-food stands crowded into a quarter-mile stretch, was abandoned.

But summer, tight security and a period of relative quiet have restored the bustle to this entertainment strip on the city's south side, while much of the downtown continues to languish. Emek Refa'im merchants received an additional boost when the 19th annual Jerusalem International Film Festival opened mid-July at the Jerusalem Cinematheque, just a few blocks away.

One of those merchants is Nurit Steinfeld. Last May, she opened Haruzim, a jewelry shop in which customers select beads to be strung into necklaces. In July, she closed a similar shop she had had in the city centre for eight years, because, she said, "the situation downtown was catastrophic. People weren't walking around."

Emek Refa'im, on the contrary, is a "street for strollers" and the new shop "was an immediate success," Steinfeld, 50, said. "It is more successful than the downtown store ever was… [and] things went well during the film festival."

Another merchant, Yaron Menashe, 29, is co-owner of the popular new Coffee Shop.

"The street is coming alive, becoming Jerusalem's Sheinkin," said Menashe, referring to Tel Aviv's famous yuppie strip. "I hope it will become even livelier."

The German Colony gets its name from the group of Germans, members of a Christian sect, who settled the area in the 1870s and lived there until World War II, when they were expelled by the British for being Nazi sympathizers. Many of the one- and two-story houses they built still stand, alongside highly ornamented Arab-built houses and modern condos. Today, the German Colony is a Jewish neighbourhood.

Signs of the street's awakening are sidewalk stands at which vendors hawk organic olive oil and homemade cookies. Avital Steinitz, a 19-year-old soldier home on leave, comes to Emek Refa'im on Fridays, the main shopping day, to sell his cookies.

The street is an "island of sanity… where you don't feel the recession and the political situation," he said. "It's not that the people here are cut off from reality. But they go on living."

They do so even on Saturday, the country's official day of rest, when nearly all businesses and places of entertainment in the city are closed. A cinema, two cafés and now a new McDonald's do a brisk business on Shabbat.

To enhance their customers' sense of safety, many cafés, such as the popular Caffit, where a suicide bombing was averted last March when the trigger mechanism failed, have installed metal gates. Security guards unlock the gates only after they have checked customers with a metal detector. There is a constant police presence, in the form of patrol cars and roadblocks at either end of the street.

But not all diners, drinkers and shoppers on Emek Refa'im sit behind locked gates. Shops have no security guards. Fast-food stands and some of the bars and cafés have sidewalk tables with no apparent protection against terror attacks. What makes the apparent relaxation possible is a safety calculus performed by each individual.

Bilmes, who has eaten out several times on Emek Refa'im, admitted he wouldn't relax completely "until the minute we set foot home safely" in Connecticut. But when he ate out, he said he "wasn't that nervous because three of the places were pizza or falafel stands at lunchtime.

"I figured that if there was going to be a bomber, they would look for a place with more people."

Ester Inbal, 29, a doctoral student in genetics at Jerusalem's Hebrew University, said she avoids crowded places but felt relaxed as she munched on a late dinner of Thai stir-fry at a sidewalk table.

"There are no security arrangements here, but there are also few people," she said. "Where there's no crowd, I feel more comfortable."

For jewelry-store owner Steinfeld, it is the nature of her business that affords protection. "A terror attack can happen anywhere," she said, "but I've never thought a terrorist would come into a bead store."

And for Sara Thenen, 52, who spends every evening with friends at an outdoor table at Gaffen Wine Center, it is precisely the lack of security that helps.

"I'm always afraid," said Thenen, who is employed by an NGO that promotes workers' rights. "[But] a place with a security guard draws [terrorist] fire."

One of Thenen's companions, Kobi Tekhoa, 54, said he provides his own security: "I keep looking around to spot suspicious characters."

Paradoxically, fatalism seems to calm people of various ages.

"I'm here every day," said Amnon Lecker, 16, one of the youngsters lined up for a glow-in-the-dark necklace. "If God wants to take you, He will."

Steinfeld, too, admits to a kind of fatalism, though each time she boards a bus, she thinks about which seats are the safest in the event of an attack. "What helps me is feeling that if my life is meant to end, it will end," she said.

And then there are those who simply can't stay home. "I wouldn't sit in a place without security," said photographer Shabi Hamawi, 26, as he sat in the Coffee Shop at a large open window facing the street. "I come here a lot. It's my life. People are smiling; there's a feeling that [the terror] is behind us. Jerusalem has such energy."

Esther Hecht is a writer living in Jerusalem.

The Week in Israel

Aug. 5

• Avi Volanski, 29, and his pregnant wife, Avital, 27, were killed and their toddler son was wounded in a terrorist ambush as the couple was driving Sunday night to their home in Eli in the West Bank.

Aug. 6

• The Israel Defence Forces, near Jenin, killed Ali Ajouri, 23, a local leader of the Al-Aqsa Martyrs Brigade. Ajouri was thought to have plotted the double suicide bombing on Tisha b'Av in Tel Aviv's Neve Shaanan quarter, which killed 5 people and wounded 40. He was also believed to have sent at least two other suicide bombers into Israel in the last three months.

Kasparov to take on Israeli chess program

By YUVAL DROR
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Garry Kasparov, the world chess champion, will match himself against the Israeli chess program "Junior" in Jerusalem on Oct. 1.

In Jerusalem to announce it, Kasparov said that if he wins the planned six-game match, he would donate some of the $1 million (US) purse to victims of terror attacks and their families.

The program was developed by two Israeli software engineers: Amir Ban, one of the founders of the Israeli high-tech company M-Systems, and Shay Bushinsky, director of development for the Kasparov Chess company.

The two began work on the program in 1994. Since then, Junior has twice won the world microcomputer chess championship on Israel's behalf, in 1997 and 2000. Last year, it won a third, and more prestigious, title for Israel – the world computer chess championship for all types of computers – and two weeks ago, it successfully defended this title, beating previous winning programs from the U.S., Russia, Germany and Holland. It was this victory that prompted Kasparov's offer of a challenge match.

In an interview, Bushinsky noted that the planned Kasparov-Junior match is a rare event. "When Kasparov lost in 1997 to IBM's 'Deep Blue' program, chess players went into shock," he said. "Since then, no chess master has challenged a computer program."

However, he said, this was partly because expert players initially had no real chance to practise against computers.

"Deep Blue played a total of six games and then disappeared," Bushinsky explained.

In contrast, Kasparov has had ample opportunity to become familiar with Junior, and he now believes that he has discovered its weaknesses and can therefore defeat it. Kirsan Ilyumzhinov, president of the World Chess Federation (FIDE – Fédération Internationale des Echecs), said that an experienced international judge would supervise the competition, which will be attended by the organization's leadership and representatives of its 162 member states. "Humanity is hoping that Garry will beat the computer," he said.

As a contribution to the peace process, he added, the challenge match will include a friendly chess competition between 100 young Israelis and Palestinians.

Kasparov said he sees the upcoming match as symbolizing a new era in the "man versus machine" contest.

Associates of the chess champion said it was Kasparov who insisted on the venue, spurred by a similar challenge match in Bahrain – sponsored by the emir of Bahrain and the Arab satellite television station Al Jazeera – between the world's second-ranked chess player, Vladimir Kramnik, and the German chess program that is currently ranked fourth in the world.

"I'm certain that Kasparov thinks he will beat Junior," Bushinsky said, adding that he and Ban would soon begin preparing the program for the upcoming match.

But who does he think will win? "Junior, of course," replied Bushinsky.

The Believer explores violent Jewish self-hatred

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

The events in The Believer, a jolting movie written and directed by Henry Bean, are not merely figments of Bean's imagination.

In the mid-1960s, an enterprising reporter from The New York Times stumbled upon a sizzling hot story. He discovered that the leader of the Ku Klux Klan chapter in the city was none other than Daniel Burros, who was born and raised a Jew.

When the reporter's story appeared on the front page of the newspaper, Burros shot himself, thus bringing to an ignominious end the life of a self-hating, pathetic Jewish man.

In The Believer, which opens Aug. 16 at the Carlton and Bayview theatres, the Burros character is embodied in the person of Danny Balint (Ryan Gosling), a former yeshiva student who has rebelled against his people with a vengeance.

There are, he claims at a meeting of like-minded neo-fascists, "50 reasons" to hate Jews.

Comparing Jews to rats and Judaism to a sickness, the intense Balint claims that Jews control and manipulate the media, that they are rootless nomads, that they incite class warfare and that they pull at "the fabric of life."

It isn't completely clear why Balint has become a neo-Nazi skinhead. But as a series of jarring black-and-white flashbacks indicate, Balint, as a precocious yeshiva student, had serious theological disputes with his impatient teacher and never reconciled himself to the generally submissive manner in which the vast majority of Jews went to their deaths during the Holocaust.

As the film opens, Balint, sporting a jersey emblazoned with a bold swastika, is lifting weights, hardening his body for the street battles that surely lie ahead.

On a crowded subway, he spies a bookish Jewish student wearing a kippah. When Balint harasses him, he leaves the train. Outside the station, Balint beats him, calling the victim a "yeshiva bocher" and a "fu--ing Jew." This throbbing scene firmly establishes Balint's "credentials" as a violent thug.

Ryan Gosling stars as Danny Balint in The Believer.

The scene shifts to the home of Linda Moebius (Theresa Russell), a neo-fascist sympathizer. The guest speaker, Curtis Zampf (Billy Zane), claims that Jews "are not an issue anymore," and that anti-Semitism has become passe.

His remarks clearly irritate Balint, whose objective is to build a society modelled after Nazi Germany.

Although Moebius and Zampf do not share Balint's hardcore beliefs, they are impressed by his quick intelligence and his ability to articulate ideas. As Balint rises in the organization, a freelance reporter seeks him out for an interview.

He surprises the usually self-possessed Balint with a pointed question: How can you be a neo-Nazi when you're Jewish yourself? "Do I look Jewish," Balint asks plaintively. He threatens to sue the reporter's "Jewish newspaper," and then to commit suicide, if his Jewish identity is revealed.

These scenes unfold with a dramatic tautness that is the hallmark of The Believer.

A misdemeanour in a Jewish restaurant prompts a judge to order them into "sensitivity training" with Holocaust survivors. "We have nothing to learn from these people," Balint says dismissively.

Although Balint is a zealous anti-Semite, the level of his Jewish knowledge arouses suspicion. Balint retorts, "If you really hate something, you study it."

Despite his ardent anti-Semitic outlook, Balint, as Bean suggests, is basically conflicted. When he and his fellow neo-Nazis are planting a bomb in the shul, Balint is strangely moved by the ark and the Torah scroll.

And in a bizarre turn that strains the credibility of The Believer and highlights the inconsistencies in Balint's mind, he teaches his impressionable girlfriend (Summer Phoenix) Hebrew and momentarily leads a Jewish congregation in prayer.

In spite of these lapses, this is a strong, largely plausible film, whose gravitas is greatly enhanced by Gosling's superb performance.

The Believer is far-fetched at times, but it commands a viewer's attention and interest.

Actress loses her head over Stratford career

By ADAM GRACHNIK
CJN Intern

Julie Tepperman couldn't be happier.

The graduate of the George Brown Theatre School says she was prepared for a life of not knowing what she was doing six months in advance. Now, at 23, the actress has a nine-month contract with the Stratford Festival, currently in its 50th season, and has been chosen to study at Stratford's exclusive Conservatory for Classical Theatre Training in the fall.

"It's really quite remarkable," said the Thornhill native, who also spent four years at York University. "Most [acting] jobs are for two or three months."

Though Tepperman is not starring in any production, she plays minor roles in two performances in her rookie season. She is Isabelle the maid in All's Well That Ends Well and Henriette Bavay in The Scarlet Pimpernel, where she is beheaded in the opening scene.

Julie Tepperman

"She [Bavay] is beheaded; that's how it starts," said Tepperman about the play adapted from a 1905 novel by Baroness Orczy about a fictional British hero of the French Revolution. "It's the most chilling opening to a scene ever."

In the novel/play, a French actress begins to admire her English husband after she learns that he is the legendary Scarlet Pimpernel, a man who risked his life to save French aristocrats from the guillotine.

Tepperman said she "has never been in anything this big before.

"It's amazing to see all the elements of a production come together," she said.

William Shakespeare's All's Well That Ends Well is about a doctor's daughter who cures the ailing king of France and claims marriage to a young lord as her reward. Tepperman, in a non-speaking role, plays Isabelle the maid and is also the understudy to Diana and Mariana.

"It's a difficult play," but added that "because the run is so long, chances are [she will] be in," Tepperman said.

Either way, she said, the experience of working alongside top performers is rewarding for her.

"It's different [from] anything I have experienced," said Tepperman, who attended Associated Hebrew Schools until Grade 5 and graduated from Unionville Secondary School in 1997. "I am able to observe their work and learn through osmosis."

Tepperman said her first few weeks at Stratford were like a maze. She tried to learn where all the buildings were while rehearsing "all the time."

"[It was a] pretty intense time, being away from home with new surroundings. It's like Grade 9 all over again," she said. "I had a hard time speaking to people."

But she is now settled and is eagerly preparing for her fall classes.

"I'm quite happy. They only pick 12 people and I really wanted to do it," said the actress, who had to forgo a role in King Lear to accept the placement. "I can't be in King Lear, but it gives a very realistic view of how theatre works and I'm getting to do it every day."

The conservatory, founded in 1998, provides young performers with a 15-week program taught by senior artists. It develops students' voice, movement and understanding of classical texts and acting.

Tepperman said her success is due to "always having very supportive parents," and being taught by "really wonderful teachers."

All's Well That Ends Well runs until Aug. 31 and The Scarlet Pimpernel plays until Nov. 2. For tickets call, 1-800-567-1600.

MODERNIST CERAMICS BY RIE AND COPER ON VIEW AT GARDINER MUSEUM

Dame Lucie Rie (1902-1995) and Hans Coper (1920-1981) are credited with revolutionizing ceramic art by embracing the rigorous simplicity of modernism. The Vienna-born Rie and German-born Coper are said to have established a new European aesthetic based on modernist design principles.

An exhibition at Toronto's Gardiner Museum of Ceramic Art showcases representative pieces by Coper and Rie and traces their influence in the work of 56 contemporary ceramic artists. Items in Ceramic Modernism: Hans Coper, Lucie Rie and Their Legacy include colourful bowls, vases, cups and saucers by Rie and elegant sophisticated sculptural pieces by Coper.

Rie, who studied art in Vienna, was forced to flee Austria in 1938. Coper escaped Germany in 1939 but was interned as an enemy alien in England and briefly in Canada; after being sent back to England, he joined the war effort.

At the Gardiner Museum until Sept. 2. 111 Queen's Park. 416-586-8080.

Moscow Yiddishist on Tour: Yefim Aleksandrov, a Muscovite performer of traditional Jewish songs, is the producer of Songs of the Jewish Shtetl, a musical currently on a 16-city tour of North America.

The 30-person show features Yiddish songs and dancers in traditional folk costumes, and has been warmly received in Russia, Germany and Israel. It is "totally dedicated to the preservation of Jewish culture in the mother tongue [Yiddish]," Aleksandrov explains. According to the Moscow Courier, "every song is a visual episode of the days gone by of the Jewish villages," even as the show still retains a strong contemporary feeling.

Agam Donates Sculpture: Israeli sculptor Yaakov Agam, who lives in France, was in Jerusalem recently for the dedication of a new sculpture he donated to Yad Sarah, the large volunteer organization that helps people with disabilities.

Agam calls the work Being and Becoming and describes it as a "fluid piece, a wheel within a wheel... [symbolizing] freedom of movement and a fuller life." It adorns the entrance of Yad Sarah's headquarters on Jerusalem's Herzl Boulevard.

Yad Sarah provides a spectrum of valuable medical services for free or at a nominal fee to people in need. It relies on 6,000 volunteers at more than 90 branches throughout Israel.

Red Hot Mama was a philanthropist

By BEN ROSE
Special to the CJN

TORONTO — Performer Sophie Tucker gave millions of dollars to Zionist causes, wrote a letter to Hitler admonishing him for banning her My Yiddishe Mama record in Germany and worked "black face" to start her vaudeville career.

"Sophie was never comfortable with radio and TV formats because she was not used to any restraint," said Valerie Boyle, who portrays Tucker in Sophie, Last of the Red Hot Mamas, which opens at the Red Barn Theatre in Jackson's Point for previews on Aug. 28 and runs until Sept. 14.

From the time Israel was established in 1948 until she died at age 82 in 1966, Tucker donated large amounts to the Jewish National Fund and other Zionist charities. There are schools named for her in Israel.

She first realized how important her Jewish roots were when she performed in England in the 1930s and a large Jewish audience connected with her.

"I'm amazed by the number of people who come up to me and say, 'I didn't realize that Sophie lived that kind of life,'" Boyle said after her performances in the play last year in Orangeville, Hamilton, Port Dover and Peterborough.

Valerie Boyle portrays Sophie Tucker at Red Barn Theatre.

Boyle has done hours of research on Tucker's life, read her autobiography, Some of these Days, and collected lots of her sheet music, as well as 78s, long-play records, discs and tapes of her songs.

Tucker was born in a farmer's field near the Baltic Sea. Her mother was about to give birth to her when the wagon driver taking them out of Poland threw her mother and two-year-old brother Phil out of the wagon because he had a schedule to keep.

Years later, when she first went to New York, she worked as a prostitute and was arrested.

Tucker was married three times, once when she was just 15 and had given birth to a son, once to an alcoholic and once to a gambler. All three marriages ended in divorce, and she was forever paying alimony.

Boyle, who is not Jewish, tells it as it was, leaving out none of the twists in Tucker's career. She sings her songs, using Yiddish expressions.

"Sophie's family came to Ellis Island in 1886 under the identity of an Italian Catholic who had befriended her father, Lewis Tuck, in Poland," Boyle said. "Outwardly, they were Catholics, but they retained all of the Jewish rituals inwardly. She used expressions like chutzpah, mishpoche, oy vey and shmatte, but she didn't do them very well because she never really understood Yiddish.

"When I was learning her songs, I had coaching from a Yiddish lady, Ruth Slater, of Hamilton, a singer who is now retired. Until then, I didn't realize how different Yiddish is, depending on what country people come from."

In the production, Boyle says she enjoys her interaction with Randy Vancourt, who plays the part of Teddy Shapiro, Tucker's accompanist for 48 years. (She never signed a contract with him, because she thought it would be bad luck.)

Vancourt, who was one of the comedians in Chutzpah A Go Go, is now in an acting and piano-playing role in a Brockville play.

Boyle is currently in front of the cameras, playing the part of a school principal in an NBC children's TV show that will air in September.

Sophie was written by Boyle and revised by Jordan Merkur, Red Barn's artistic director.

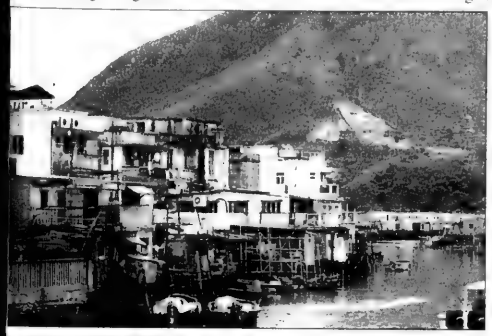
Hong Kong is not all skyscrapers and packed roads

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

GRASS ISLAND — This small, remote island in the South China Sea, known locally as Tap Mun Chau, seems a long, long way from Hong Kong's towering urban landscape and relentlessly frenetic pace.

Sprinkled with sprays of white and pink flowers, the kind often seen in delicate Chinese watercolours, Grass Island is part of an archipelago of islands that constitute the greater Hong Kong area.



The fishing village of Tai O.

When Canadians think of Hong Kong, they usually conjure up images of a busy waterfront, gleaming skyscrapers, upscale malls, jam-packed roads, crowded sidewalks and picturesque outdoor markets.

They most definitely do not associate Hong Kong with green, serene getaways like Grass Island, or with the sandy beaches and ethereal Buddhist statues on neighbouring Lantau Island.

But if you look at a map, you'll soon discover that Hong Kong does not just consist of Hong Kong Island and adjacent Kowloon, the hub of its commercial and financial districts.

In fact, the biggest chunk of Hong Kong, a whopping 88 per cent, is composed of the New Territories, north of Hong Kong Island and Kowloon, and the 200 or so islands and islets scattered throughout the South China Sea.

Once you're plugged into this reality, you can experience Hong Kong's largely unspoiled rural hinterland, so near and yet so far.

Not being all that familiar with this dimension of its geography, I joined an ecotour of the New Territories and Grass Island. It was organized by Paul Etherington of Hong Kong-based Natural Excursion Ideals Company.

He picked me up at my hotel, the Peninsula in Kowloon, and we drove 35 kilometres northwest to the Sai Kung Peninsula.

Within about 30 minutes, the noise and congestion of Kowloon gave way to the sheer bliss and glorious mountainous greenery of the New Territories.

We boarded a ferry, and within 20 minutes, we disembarked on Grass Island, some two kilometres in length and less than a kilometre in width at its widest point.

The island supports a permanent population of about 100, mainly fishermen and their families.

On weekends, though, it is overrun with tourists from Hong Kong eager to enjoy its isolation, explore its nooks and crannies and sample its seafood. Since we were there on a Thursday, we practically had Grass Island to ourselves.

Etherington, a British ex-pat who settled in Hong Kong 25 years ago, showed me the Tin Hau Temple. Close to the docks, it was built during the Qing dynasty. To me, it was just another temple, undistinguished by architectural flair.

We walked up a cow path, past a profusion of white and pink hackberry shrubs, and reached a scenic bluff with an enchanting view of fishing boats.

Then, as we skirted a Taoist cemetery, we passed a herd of wild cattle grazing contentedly in a sloping pasture.

Grass Island has a calming effect on visitors. I was impressed by its sylvan splendour and simple charms. It was, in a word, perfect.

After a hearty meal at a restaurant, we headed back to the New Territories for a round of cycling. I was not entirely comfortable with the bike, since it lacked adjustable handlebars. Nor was there a large enough safety helmet for me. Nonetheless, I set off.

The countryside was lush, the day was humid. We cycled along a narrow concrete path, and eventually we reached a quiet bay, where we paused for a photograph. By then, I was tired and drenched in perspiration.

The ride back to Etherington's van was harder, given the steep ascents and the sweltering weather. As I negotiated a curve, my left brake hit a railing. I was sent flying, first to the left and then, violently, to the right as my lower back hit an exposed rock.

Etherington helped me up, but I was in pain. Despite the mishap, I enjoyed this segment of the trip.

Several days later, having partially recovered from my fall, I joined a bus tour of Lantau Island, which is almost twice the size of Hong Kong Island.

Densely wooded and ridged with relatively high mountains, Lantau Island is still rather wild, a refuge of deer, armadillos, squirrels, water buffalo, cattle and python snakes.

But clusters of apartment buildings, as well as Hong Kong's new airport, Chek Lap Kok, have filled in some of the void.

And now comes word that Disneyland is building a theme park near the airport.

Despite these encroachments, 60 per cent of Lantau Island remains parkland. It should also be noted that the island, the advance of urbanization notwithstanding, is still served by an antiquated one-lane road, which tends to slow traffic in both directions.

Lantau's southern coast has the best sandy beach in Hong Kong, Cheung Sha. The interior of the island is crowned by pine-clad Phoenix mountain, the island's highest peak. It is ideal for hiking.

The village of Tai O, whose fishing fleet has been reduced to some 20 vessels, exudes a quiet, understated charm. Vendors sell a huge variety of fish, fresh and dry, on its main street.

The island's main claim to fame is probably the Po Lin Monastery, a religious retreat built in the 1920s.

Two hundred and fifty steps lead to the Tian Tan Buddha statue, which was cast in Nanjing, China. Often wreathed in mist, the statue is 34 metres tall, a ghostly monolith that attracts tens of thousands of visitors annually.

How old is old?

Photography exhibit dispels myths with depictions of vibrant seniors

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Sara Pachter, who escorts travel groups, was born in 1915. Is she old?

The great jazz pianist Oscar Peterson was born in 1925. Is he old?

Social worker and photographer Irene Borins Ash, 50, tries to answer these questions – and dispel some outdated myths about aging – in a new exhibit titled Treasured Legacies, which opens Sunday, Aug. 25, and runs to Sept. 30 at Holy Blossom Temple in the Cecile and Harry Pearl Gallery.

The show includes photographs of Jean Vanier, June Callwood, Nathan Leipciger, Ed Mirvish, Dr. Henry Morgentaler and Rabbi Gunther Plaut, along with some 40 other seniors, all over age 60. Each picture is accompanied by one or two paragraphs in which the subjects share their wisdom.

Borins Ash says the pictures depict vibrant and high-functioning people from a variety of occupations, cultures and social backgrounds – well-known and not-so-well-known individuals who have developed healthy attitudes to growing older.

"They have meaningful and joyous lives in spite of losses and changes," she says. "Aging well starts when a person is young."

She says the exhibit is important for seniors to view, but it will also be of interest to younger people. "Young people don't want to see older people. I'm trying to show them that there is beauty in the aging face."

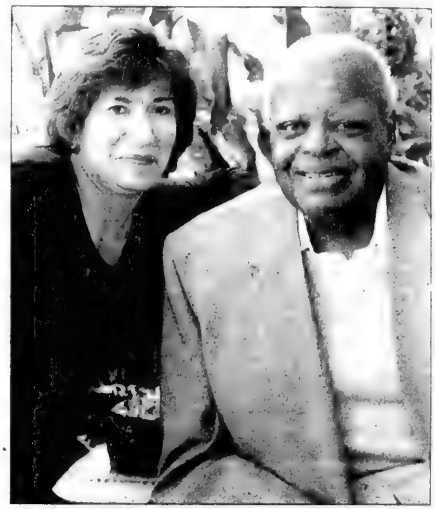
In 1994, Borins Ash who has worked with the elderly for many years, presented a paper on healthy, gracious and meaningful aging at the Baycrest Centre for Geriatric Care, and in 1999, she delivered papers at the Ontario Gerontology Association and the Fourth Global Conference of the International Federation on Aging. The presentations led to her interest in photographing seniors.

"These people look their age, but they remained active because they accepted that they were aging and who they are, and their limitations. Above all, these active, vibrant and joyous people enjoy their lives."

She believes that there is a strong connection between the mind, body and spirit. "When all three are in harmony, a person has a better chance at gracious aging."

The exhibit's Aug. 25 opening will run from 2 to 4:30 p.m. and feature Oscar Peterson as guest speaker. His topic is Creativity and Aging.

For more information on the Treasured Legacies exhibit, which is sponsored by long-term care provider Leisureworld Caregiving Centres, call Holy Blossom Temple, 416-789-3291 ext. 221.



Photographer and social worker, Irene Borins Ash, whose photographic exhibit opens soon at Holy Blossom Temple, is seen with jazz pianist Oscar Peterson.

Play explores father and son tensions

By BEN ROSE
Special to CJN

The relationship between famed writer Franz Kafka and his father, Herman, was a torturous one, so much so, that at age 35, the younger Kafka bared his soul in a 50-page letter to his domineering dad.

Alon Nashman, with the help of co-author Mark Cassidy, has adapted the letter into a play, Kafka and Son, in which Nashman plays both men.

It will be one of the featured attractions at the Ashkenaz Festival, which runs from Aug. 31 to Sept. 2, at Harbourfront.

The letter reveals much about Kafka's inner life and about the always-epic relationship between father and son.

But the play also evokes the women in Franz's life – his fiancée and mother – who tease him toward the impossible poles of sex and succour.

"He is the ultimate, sensitive Jewish artist, a sort of canary in the mine who sensed the rising tide of fascism in Europe, in which the individual can be reduced to a number. But what he was responding to more than anything else was an agonized relationship with his overbearing father," Nashman said.

"Kafka is so enticing to me because he is a kindred spirit and an inspiration," Nashman said. "I identify with his view of the world, both absurd and unwittingly truthful, and I find him painfully funny to read."

He never actually wrote plays, but Kafka loved the theatre and there is an inherent dramatic quality to his work, Nashman said.

Kafka is also the latest in a string of prominent intellectual figures Nashman has portrayed on stage.

"I've made a career out of playing people much smarter than me," Nashman jokes. "I've been Albert Einstein, Allen Ginsberg, Jesus, astronomer Johannes Kepler, and Rabbi Akiva."

Nashman attributes his start as an actor to his own father, Harold, who was founding director of Camp Wahanowin.

"Thankfully, my life is less fraught than Kafka's. I am blessed with a wonderful wife, Elizabeth, and three amazing children, Tiferet, 7, Hershel, 4, and Nashma, 2, who all accommodate the sometimes crazy schedule of an actor. And I have an excellent relationship with my father."

Cassidy, who is also the play's director, said that when it comes to the relationship between fathers and sons, the play is just as relevant today as when the letter was written.

Along with Suzanne Hersh, Cassidy is co-artistic director of Threshold Theatre, which will stage Kafka and Son. It will get a post-Ashkenaz showing Jan. 11 at the official re-opening of the Miles S. Nadal Jewish Community Centre (formerly the Bloor JCC).

Nisker wins fans in Masters tennis debut

By MARVIN GLASSMAN
Special to the CJN

Andrew Nisker of London, Ont., ranked ninth among Canadian tennis players, would barely be recognized on the street by fans of professional tennis. Yet, when he made his debut at the recent $2.95-million U.S. Tennis Masters Series Canadian Open at York University, fans greeted him with the affection generally shown for top players of the game, such as Andre Agassi and Pete Sampras.

The 23-year-old Nisker, ranked 799th in men's professional tennis, was a huge underdog against American Alex Kim in his qualifying round match.

However, Nisker showed guile and determination in grinding out a tough match before losing 7-6 (5), 6-3 before the cheers of the partisan Canadian fans at centre court.

Nisker's low ranking does not indicate the promise he showed in the match. A lot of long rallies in this baseline struggle forced Kim to come up with perfect volleys and backhands to conquer Nisker.

"I feel good despite the loss. A few points here and there may have made the difference. I now know that I am capable of playing at a high level. I am determined to look at the next year as a time to develop my game and compete at this level," said Nisker.

Nisker started playing tennis at a young age, as well as basketball, doing well in both sports. He led his high school team to a regional basketball championship, but started to excel in tennis in 1995.

Nisker won the All-Canadian singles championships that year, and was ranked third among Canadians 18 and under. He then won a scholarship to compete on the men's tennis team at Vanderbilt University in 1996.

Under the coaching of former American Davis Cup doubles player Ken Flach, Nisker was ranked as high as 20th in American collegiate singles.

"I owe Ken Flach a lot for what I learned from him. The struggle has been hard since I graduated from Vanderbilt in 2000. I am playing a lot of satellite tournaments [he was a finalist in one tournament and a quarter-finalist twice since his graduation] and feel the best is yet to come."

In doubles, Nisker and fellow Canadian Frank Dancevic teamed up before a few hundred fans who rallied the duo to a 3-6, 7-6 (5), 6-2 victory over the team of Andrew Florent and Chris Haggard. Trailing 3-0 in the second set, Dancevic and Nisker broke serve and won the tie-break with aggressive shots.

"The fans helped us win. They encouraged us when we could have been wiped out."

Dancevic and Nisker lost their next match to the seventh seeds, David Prinosil and David Rickl, 6-4, 6-2, but still gained fans. The Canadian duo were signing autographs for fans that week in a session by Tennis Canada titled New Balls Please Canada, showcasing rising Canadian players.

The Canadian Open had four Israeli players (Noam Behr, Amir Hadad, Harel Levy, Noam Okun) and a Jewish player from Argentina (Gaston Etlis) competing in the qualifying round. None of them advanced into the main draw.

Most disappointed by his showing was Levy, who in 1990 had the best performance ever by an Israeli athlete in Canada, when he finished as a finalist to Marat Safin in the Canadian Open in Toronto. Levy's ranking was as high as 30th in 2001, including a victory over Pete Sampras.

Andrew Nisker

Levy suffered a hip injury in November 200 and was out of action fo the next six months. He has never regained hi form since returning t the tennis wars. Hi ranking has now plum meted to 322.

"I feel that it is just matter of getting more matches before I am back in the top 50. No matter how well I do for the rest of my career, I will never forget doing so well in Toronto two years ago," said Levy.

Drop shots: Sharon Fichman, 11, of Fores Hill defeated 12-year-old Aaron Chan 7-5 in a tie-break co-ed challenge event held at the National Tennis Centre. Fichman is ranked as the number one player in Canada 12 and under... Former Russian and now Israeli tennis star Anna Smashnova was scheduled to play at the Rogers AT&T Challenge women's tennis event in Montreal Aug. 10-18. Ranked 18th on the women's professional circuit, Smashnova is the highest ranked Israeli ever in the history of women's tennis.

Tryouts planned for Pan Am Maccabi Games

Maccabi Canada is inviting Jewish athletes who would like to represent Canada at next summer's Pan American Maccabi Games in Caracas, Venezuela to try out in a number of sports.

The Jewish sporting organization is looking for athletes in baseball, basketball, beach volleyball, bowling, bridge, golf, gymnastics, half marathon, judo, karate, rugby 7, soccer, softball, squash, swimming, tennis, triathlon, volleyball and water polo.

For the first time at a Maccabi-sanctioned event, the basketball tournament will include a youth competition. Eligible players must be born between Jan. 1, 1984 and Dec. 31, 1986.

For information regarding trials for all sports, contact Ted Badner at 905-707-7556. For general information call Allen Gerskup at 416-630-7799, ext. 223. Maccabi officials can also be reached by e-mail at: maccabi@maccabicanada.com.

The Pan American Maccabi Games are held every four years as a celebration of Jewish unity, culture and pride through athletic competition. The 10th Pan Am Games will take place from July 17 to 28, 2003.

In addition to athletes from North, Central and South American nations, Great Britain, Australia and Israel will also send participants to the games.

The Pan Am Maccabi Games are sponsored by the Latin American Maccabi Federation ("CLAM") and are similar to the Maccabiah Games held in Israel.

Although sports competition is the games' primary focus, they are also intended to promote friendship and camaraderie, to share Jewish culture and traditions and to foster a sense of unity and pride among Jews from around the world. Approximately 2,500 participants from 20 countries will gather in Caracas for the games.

The Venezuelan and Canadian organizing committees have designed a varied program for the Canadian team that includes sightseeing, parties and cultural events.

Breaking the silence

By ART EGGLETON

Guest Voice

The people of Israel are struggling to protect their children's right to live and laugh in their own neighbourhoods without a threat of violence and intimidation.

Despite the horror of the Holocaust, Israel has been largely on its own throughout its existence, fighting for survival in the face of regional hostility and insidious terrorism. The world did not intervene when Israel was attacked in 1948, when it was completely encircled in 1967 or when it was invaded in 1973. It is true that a select few, such as Canada, have always defended Israel's right to exist. But the world has criticized Israel again and again when it has legitimately defended itself from terror. Against this onslaught, the voices of solidarity for the embattled nation have been few and far between.

Today, Israel faces a new kind of threat. It faces suicidal guerrilla-style terrorist networks, which target civilians in order to intimidate the Israeli public through the murder of the greatest number of innocent people. These evil acts of terrorism are just the new manifestations of the old struggle of self-preservation that the Jewish people have been forced to fight against the forces of extremism and hatred.

Yet through it all, Israel's tikvah/hope for a sustainable peace has never diminished, and its commitment to its legitimate quest for security has never wavered. It is time for Canada and for the world to break the silence and stand shoulder to shoulder with Israel in a united front against terrorism. Canada must be fully supportive of Israel's legitimate right to defend itself and its citizens from attack. We cannot separate our own war against terrorism in Afghanistan from the war that Israel fights. There is no moral equivalence between a suicide bombing that destroys a Passover meal and the cautious, precise Israeli military reaction to capturing and arresting the perpetrators who have masterminded and supported this act of barbarity. Terrorism is a political message wrapped in flames of violence. It is never justified and it is always evil.

We must not forget that Palestinian Authority (PA) President Yasser Arafat rejected the generous offer of peace that former Israeli prime minister Ehud Barak put forth during the Camp David II negotiations in July 2000 and in Taba in September 2000. It is also clear that in the aftermath of the unilateral Israeli withdrawal from Lebanon, many within the PA leadership made a conscious choice to embrace barbarism in the misplaced hope that Israelis would tire from the persistent violence and would unilaterally concede. At the very least, the PA has chosen to allow waves of suicide bombers to slaughter innocent people instead of undertaking meaningful negotiations that would result in a lasting, mutual compromise.

Canada must make it clear to the PA that it must stop all terror attacks directed against Israel. We must unequivocally state that the PA must do everything in its power to thwart its own militants, as well as the terrorist groupings of Hamas and Islamic Jihad, not only from carrying out their atrocities, but also from operating. The PA leadership must rein in the militants and close down the machinery of anti-Semitic propaganda that it controls. The teaching of hatred of Jews must be stopped and the glorification of death must cease.

The world is now calling for elections inside the disputed territories. It is a unique opportunity for the Palestinian people to take their destiny into their own hands and reject the corrupt regime of violence that has enriched Arafat and bankrupted their economy.

The Middle East has always been a baffling maze of rivalries and hatreds, but this quagmire status quo does not have to persist. Israelis have proven in Camp David II and in Taba that they wish to reach a two-state solution that will respect the legitimate aspirations of the Palestinian people. It is now time for the Palestinian people to choose peace and elect a leadership that will grant Israel a permanent peace and defensible borders. And if the world will break its silence and side with those who fight to defend their children instead of those who sacrifice them, we might live to see peace in the Holy Land.

About Teens

Dear Karilani,

I just returned from being away at summer camp for four weeks. I had a great time at camp and I wish that it hadn't ended so quickly! Now that I am back home in the city though, I feel nervous about being here. During my month away, I didn't really keep in touch with my friends from school, and I feel a bit disconnected from them. Last year was my first year of high school, so most of my friends are relatively new. Why is my adjustment back to the city so difficult?

Camp-Connected

Dear Camp-Connected,

Your re-adjustment to city life after being away for the summer is totally normal! The transition between any two intense social experiences, in your case camp and school, is stressful for anyone.

Feel free to take your time getting used to being home before you jump back into the swing of city life. Getting over the post-camp blues requires some relaxation and down time at home. Keep in mind that during summer vacation, most teenagers have independent and individual experiences, so everyone is going to have to make that same adjustment back home. You are not the only one!

Once you are used to being back at home, make contact with your friends in the city. Start slowly by calling one or two school friends. Once you speak to one or two people, you will probably see that most people are feeling the same nervousness as you are experiencing, and that will make it easier for you overcome your own discomfort. Before you know it, you will be excitedly making plans to spend time with your friends from home! Enjoy the rest of your summer!

Dear Karilani is written on a rotating basis by three high school students. The drawing is a composite. We welcome questions from our readers. Please mail, e-mail or fax them to The CJN.

Terrorist list may grow

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Canadian policy-makers appear to be preparing to add three Palestinian groups to a list of organizations in the country's anti-terrorism legislation.

In a meeting last week with senior Jewish community leaders, Foreign Minster Bill Graham was lobbied to include Hamas, Islamic Jihad and the Al Aqsa Martyrs Brigade to the list of "entities [that] knowingly engaged in terrorist activity."

Please see related story on page 3.

Under the legislation, it is a criminal offence to belong to these organizations. The list is compiled by the solicitor general.

Participants in the meeting "were led to believe a list will be published. I believe our concerns will be allayed shortly," said Joseph Wilder, national chair of the Canada-Israel Committee (CIC), the Jewish community's lobbying arm on Israel.

Wilder was part of an 11-person delegation of senior leaders of national Jewish agencies who met last week with Graham and members of his staff. The 90-minute meeting, held in Toronto, included discussions on a variety of issues touching on Canada's Mideast policy.

The meeting was "cordial," but the Jewish group advanced its concerns "in a very forceful and deliberate manner. "We don't go for the purpose of a photo op," Wilder said.

The delegation pointed out that the Department of Foreign Affairs and International Trade (DFAIT) condemns acts of terror and specifically refers to Hamas and Islamic Jihad as terrorist groups on its Web site. "We say it's inconsistent under the anti-terror legislation... for them not to be there."

The participants also discussed the Yasser Arafat-led Palestinian Authority. "We called the PA an enterprise that Canada ought not to be dealing with," Wilder said. "Canada should not bolster or lend legitimacy to them."

The minister appeared to "share our frustrations" but wondered what might come after Arafat, Wilder said.

Birthright offers hope: Melchior

By ANNA MORGAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — In these difficult political times, Birthright Israel is a sign of hope for Israelis, Rabbi Michael Melchior told members of the Jewish press in a conference call last week.

Rabbi Michael Melchior

The Israeli deputy minister of foreign affairs announced that Birthright applications for the winter trip are now available and appealed to parents and organizational leaders to encourage young adults to participate in the program.

According to a TelSeker poll released recently, 45 per cent of the Israelis surveyed prefer visits as a show of solidarity to political advocacy and financial contributions. Rabbi Melchior said Israelis are taking heart from the fact that Birthright kids are still coming despite the current violence.

As a parent of five children, he said he understands concerns about safety. However, he noted "that we have now learned the patterns of terrorism and have put measures in place to deal with security."

Some of the precautions include keeping students outside of populated areas and off of all public transportation.

War Stories Sought

TORONTO — The proprietors of a planned museum near Jerusalem that will honour the 1.5 million Jewish soldiers who fought for Canada and other Allied armies in World War II are seeking memoirs, diaries and pictures from Canadian Jewish veterans. The museum will be located on the site of the Armored Corps Memorial and Museum near Ayalon, which commemorates the 4,885 soldiers killed in Israel's military campaigns. Canadians can contact the Armored Corps Association's general manager, retired brig.-gen. Menashe Inbar, by mail at D.N. ISRAEL

Arafat a Billionaire?

JERUSALEM — Palestinian Authority (PA) President Yasser Arafat has assets estimated at $1.3 billion (US), the head of Israeli military intelligence, Maj.-Gen. Aharon Ze'evi, told a Knesset committee last week. He also said Arafat is facing growing dissatisfaction among the Palestinian populace, but that the Palestinian leader is still the person who "pulls the strings" in the PA.

Nine Indicted

JERUSALEM — Nine Israelis were indicted last week in connection with the May 2001 collapse of a wedding hall here. The nine, who include the building contractor and the owners of the hall, face a variety of charges, including manslaughter and negligence. The collapse killed 23 people and injured nearly 400.

Katsav on Al-Jazeera

JERUSALEM — Israeli President Moshe Katsav was interviewed for the first time on Qatar's Al-Jazeera television network last week. He told the satellite service Israel would do whatever it can to achieve peace with the Palestinians. He also said Israel's only precondition for talks is an end to bloodshed.

WORLD

Racist Incidents Up

BERLIN — The number of anti-Semitic incidents in Berlin nearly doubled from 2000 to 2001, according to official statistics released last week. In 2001, there were 105 such cases, up from 56 the previous year, according to the state of Berlin's interior minister. The majority of cases involve anonymous mail threats sent to German Jewish officials.

Pearl Buried

LOS ANGELES — The father of Daniel Pearl said Kaddish as the slain Wall Street Journal reporter was buried last Sunday. Pearl, whose body was returned to the United States the previous week, was kidnapped earlier this year in Pakistan by Islamic radicals and forced to attest to his Jewishness before being murdered. The funeral was held at an undisclosed location in Encino, an area of southern California where Pearl's family lives.

Gay Housing at YU

NEW YORK — Yeshiva University's medical school will allow gay and lesbian couples to live together in its married student housing. The university's decision, reportedly reached late last month, ends a long-standing lawsuit launched in 1998 by two lesbian medical students whose domestic partners were not allowed to live with them in university housing at the Bronx-based Albert Einstein College of Medicine. The university won earlier court battles on the case, but the New York State Court of Appeals reinstated the lawsuit last year.

Athletes Remembered

MUNICH — A memorial ceremony for the 11 Israelis killed at the 1972 Munich Olympics was held last Sunday. The one-hour ceremony took place at the monument to the victims, a large stone tablet placed at the bridge linking the former Olympic village to the Olympic stadium. An Israeli flag was draped across the tablet. Munich hosted this year's European Championships in Athletics, which ended Aug. 11.

Premiums Jump

NEW YORK — Insurance premiums for U.S. Jewish institutions have risen so much since Sept. 11 – 50 per cent or more in some cases – that many Jewish federations and community centres have been forced to lay off staff and cut things such as after-school programs for children and services for the elderly and the poor, JTA reported last week. Insurance industry representatives deny Jewish groups are being singled out, saying other businesses and non-profit groups are also facing increased premiums because of the danger of terrorism.

Nazi to Stay in Jail

BERLIN — A former commandant in a Nazi labour camp must serve another 10 years of his life sentence, a German court has ruled. The court said Josef Schwammberger's "particularly cruel" crimes outweighed concern over the 90-year-old's frail physical condition. In 1992, Schwammberger was found responsible for the deaths of hundreds of Jews during his time as commandant at several SS labour camps in Poland from 1942 to 1944.

City Council Pays Tribute to Rosenzweig

TORONTO — At its last meeting, Toronto City Council observed a moment of silence in memory of David Rosenzweig, the 49-year-old father of six who was murdered July 14 outside a kosher pizzeria on Bathurst Street.

In a tribute motion, Mayor Mel Lastman said council members "are deeply saddened [by] the tragic death of Mr. David Rosenzweig, who died in an unprovoked attack."

He "demonstrated throughout his life an unbinding love for his family, even to the end as he assisted his son with a broken-down car," Lastman said on council's behalf.

The mayor said Rosenzweig "was a proud, loyal and committed Jew, a peaceful man who was a role model for each life he touched" and "was respected by the community he served and dedicated his life selflessly to his faith and the betterment of the world."

The motion was moved by Councillor Howard Moscoe and seconded by Councillor Howard Feldman.

Council also sent a letter of condolence to Rosenzweig's widow, Chavie.

Peace Now asks Graham to press for Mideast conference

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

A Canadian Friends of Peace Now delegation met Canada's foreign minister, Bill Graham, in Toronto last week.

The delegates, led by Peace Now co-presidents Av Sohn and Dr. Frank Guttman, urged Graham to press for a Middle East peace conference and to use Canada's influence with Israel and the United States to seek an immediate halt to Israeli settlement activity in the territories.

Peace Now also urged Canada to establish an international fund to compensate Palestinian refugees and Israeli settlers who would be resettled in the event of a peace agreement, said Sheldon Gordon, Peace Now's policy director.

In addition, Peace Now called on Canada to urge the PA to reestablish security co-operation with Israel, and to add groups such as Hamas and Hezbollah to its list of terrorist organizations.

Gordon said that Graham expressed an interest in these ideas, but did not respond with a flat yes or no to any of them.

"He was noncommittal, but his body language was open and sympathetic."

Gordon believes that Graham will now study Peace Now's memorandum at greater length.

"We think we'll see some movement on some of the points, but I can't tell you which ones."

Some are already under consideration, Gordon added.

Canada may yet add anti-Israel groups to its existing list of terrorist organizations, he said.

As well, Canada may help develop Palestinian institutions in the autonomous areas, which Israel currently occupies.

Gordon expressed satisfaction with the outcome of the one-hour meeting, held at federal government offices in downtown Toronto.

"We thought it went well. Graham was open and receptive, though it remains to be seen whether he'll adopt these ideas.

Where Time Stands Still

Israel begins with Jerusalem. It's the country's capital, its spiritual center and the hub of every visit. Jerusalem is also an enticing collection of quiet, unique neighbourhoods around every corner. One of them is Ein Kerem. Now considered a suburb of Jerusalem, Ein Kerem is actually an ancient village, unburdened by time, on the southwest side of the city. You'll find winding narrow roads, religious history, lush gardens, stone houses, artists at work, unique shopping opportunities, quaint restaurants, a music center showcasing the multiple talents of many musicians from the former Soviet Union and Hadassah hospital nearby. And while you're in Jerusalem, you may want to take in these special events.

What's Happening

- Italian Ball – August 27, 2002 at the Taverna Restaurant, with proceeds designated for the Museum of Italian Jewish Art
- Jerusalem International Chamber Music Festival September 4-13, 2002 with the Jerusalem Symphony Orchestra at the YMCA Concert Hall
- Jerusalem Judaica and Jewellery Fair – September 22-26, 2002 at the International Convention Centre

An entertaining playbill

From the editor's desk

A summertime, mid-week excursion to the Stratford Festival last week offered up a memorable pairing of theatrical performances.

The Threepenny Opera tells a rough and jarring tale of the dark, conscienceless, often brutal, side of life on the streets of pre-Victorian, early 19th-century London.

Written and first performed in 1928 in Berlin, the work was a successful collaboration between the controversial German playwright-lyricist Bertolt Brecht and composer Kurt Weill, the son of a chazzan from Dessau, Germany, who wrote the score.

Threepenny is a hard-hitting, satirical look at the norms, conventions and hypocricies of civil society – middle and upper class – as seen by the beggars, petty thieves and roughhouse criminals who comprise the hardscrabble underclass of industrial, urban society.

"The powerful of the earth can create poverty, but they can't learn to look at it," observes the contemptible, but acridly honest J. J. Peachum, who ruthlessly runs a stable of beggars.

The opera is set in the London district of Soho on the eve of Queen Victoria's coronation.

The central character is a villainous rake named Macheath (Mack the Knife), who exploits and manipulates everyone within his self-pleasing reach.

The plot revolves around two woman who love him, whom he betrays with recreational ease; the service-providers at his favourite brothel, who betray him with similar absence of conscience; and the vengeful efforts of competitor criminal cads to bring Macheath to the gallows.

Apart from the opening song, Mack the Knife, which was recorded by modern jazz stylists such as Louis Armstrong and Ella Fitzgerald, but immortalized in the early 1960s by Bobby Darin, none of the musical numbers is easily hummable or rings in the ear after the final curtain falls.

Indeed, much of the music is technically very challenging, an aggressive hybrid of fierce, often angry, libretto with atonal harmonies and minor key digressions.

Based on an earlier 18th-century play by John Gay, The Beggar's Opera, the Brecht/Weill opus imagines a play written for an audience of beggars about the beggars' life. Thus, neither the story nor the music attempts to idealize or find redemption in any aspect of the misery of life on the street in 1830-ish London. The Brecht/Weill approach is in sharp contrast, for example, to the recent musical dramatization of Victor Hugo's Les Misérables, which deals with essentially the same theme, including many of the same unsavoury types of people and set around the same time period, but in Paris.

Indeed one of the lines delivered by the character Jenny, one of Macheath's favourite former paramours at the brothel, is a haunting echo of fate of Hugo's Fantine. "I never had a family; all I had was dreams."

If the music was not generally hummable, it was almost always powerful and powerfully delivered. Especially strong performances were executed by the key female roles: Sheila McCarthy as Mrs. Peachum, deferential though cunning and sly; Susan Gilmour as Jenny, determined, vengeful and with an aching beauty to her voice; Blythe Wilson as Lucy Brown, diffident, vampish and robust in song; and Diana Coatsworth as Polly Peachum, frustratingly naive, dependent and exploited.

Peter Donaldson was outstanding as the loathsome, but somehow-still-friendly J.J. Peachum, and George Masswohl found the right comedic balance as a corrupt, craven police chief, Tiger Brown.

Some three hours later, with barely enough time to wash off the makeup, change costumes and enjoy a light dinner, Donaldson and McCarthy wowed a different audience as Sir Percy Blakeney and his wife, Marguerite in The Scarlet Pimpernel.

A dramatization of the 1905 novel by Baroness Emmuska Orczy, the plot is a high-drama tale of good vanquishing evil, of courage, treachery, rescue and triumph.

Made famous in a number of film and television versions, the story is of a fictional British hero, his true identity hidden behind a foppish facade, who risks his own life countless times to save the lives of woebegone "aristocrats" from Robespierre's guillotine across the English Channel in Paris.

This production marks the first time the play has been performed at Stratford, and director Dennis Garnhum has wisely decided to "mellow" the heart-stopping suspense of the book by making it a hybrid comedy/drama adventure. Thus, Peter Hutt's portrayal of Robespierre's special security agent, Chauvelin, whose singular task it is to find and unmask the British rogue, is entertainingly played, not as an evil menace who lurks in shadows, but as a nasty, mean, even petulant Yosemite Sam-like character obsessively chasing the silly rabbit.

Ultimately, he manages to confront his prey, but true to the destiny predestined for the evil hunter by Baroness Orczy, he loses the hero as proof of and poetic testament to the Baroness' conviction that humanity must repel inhumanity even as justice must always prevail over injustice.

The production is a delightful stop for a summer afternoon, a gift to the visual senses, rich in period costume and elaborate settings. —MBD

SEVENTY-TWO HOUR RALLY:

Jews and Christians from Canada, the United States, the United Kingdom, France, Germany, Australia, South Africa and Sri Lanka came to Israel on a 72-hour visit last week to demonstrate their support for the Jewish state. More than 1,000 demonstrators, some of whom travelled for 22 hours for the brief visit, marched through the Jewish Quarter of the Old City of Jerusalem, waving banners and singing songs. The rally's organizers, led by Rabbi Shmuel Goldin, of Englewood, N.J., had hoped to subsidize the trip, but financial backers pulled out last month, forcing many would-be supporters to drop out.

Students plan campaign against Anti-Calendar

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

Jewish students are scheduled to meet this week to plan a course of action in response to a students' "Anti-Calendar" dedicated to murdered "innocents" in Afghanistan and Palestine.

Students returning for the fall semester at the University of Toronto can expect "an aggressive campaign to challenge the Arts & Science Student Union (ASSU)," which published the Anti-Calendar, said Simon Rosenblum, director of public policy and Israel affairs for Canadian Jewish Congress.

Rosenblum, who is advising the Jewish students, said the Anti-Calendar's dedication is outrageous and will likely offend the majority of arts and science students on campus.

The Anti-Calendar is published annually as a students' evaluation and guide to arts and science courses and instructors.

Jonathan Leef, the student who first raised concerns about the guidebook, said he plans to write a letter to the ASSU "expressing my views on the Anti-Calendar and asking why such a publication is being hijacked to express personal opinions that are offensive."

It should stick to student matters and not speak out on political issues for which there is no student consensus, Leef added.

Leef, along with Lisa Isen Baumal, director of the Wolfond Centre for Jewish Campus Life at the U of T, met last week with a university race relations officer but were told the Anti-Calendar does not meet the threshold of a racist incident.

The students were advised to contact the ASSU and begin a dialogue to discuss their concerns, said Leef.

Despite criticism that the Anti-Calendar's dedication was one-sided, ASSU president Ranjini Ghosh stood by editor Terry Buckland's choice of dedication subjects. Ghosh and the ASSU executive approved the dedication prior to publication and she said there was no malicious intent in its choice of subjects.

"We just dedicated it to the innocents of Afghanistan and Palestine regardless of their caste and creed. That's all it is."

Ghosh said there was no intent to exclude anyone. The reference to the innocents of Palestine was meant to include everyone in the region, she said.

Ghosh, who described herself as an Indian Hindu, said she would not have approved any publication that was exclusive and she pointed to numerous campus programs that were available following 9/11 to support all those devastated by the terrorist attacks on New York and Washington.

She also discounted suggestions the Anti-Calendar should have steered away from political issues. "We are a political organization. We are a student union... We are supposed to have a political agenda, but not separating anyone on campus."

Earlier, Buckland told The CJN "the dedication, when it was picked, was in the news at the time – friendly fire" and referred to innocent people in Afghanistan and Palestine who were affected by ongoing warfare.

"I did not say any particular groups. I said any people in that area. I thought that covered everybody," he said.

That's "patent nonsense," Rosenblum responded.

Students at the U of T, most of whom are probably unaware of the controversy, must be informed of the position taken by their student union, he said. "We will bring this to the students and say, 'Do you want your leadership to represent you in this way? Are you comfortable with that?'"

Rosenblum expects the mainstream student body will wonder why there was no dedication to the 3,000 innocents in New York City, who were killed by terrorists flying two passenger planes into the World Trade Center, or to the innocent Israelis who are subject to terrorist attacks.

Leef said he agreed with the race relations officer's conclusion there was no racist intent in the dedication, but he believes it to be the expression of a leftist political agenda.

"The big question is, why is there such an anti-Israeli tone to leftist arguments? Where's the motive coming from? I'm noticing the expression of anti-Israel sentiment around the world is close to classic anti-Semitism, the demonization of Israel, ostracizing Israel, excluding Israel and Israelis from academic circles. It's pretty much what people did to Jews 100 years ago.

"The anti-Calendar didn't happen in a vacuum, even though it's not a racist publication."

Anti-Israel resolution cause of concerns

By ANNA MORGAN
Staff Reporter

Community leaders are concerned that the University of Toronto's Ontario Institute for Studies in Education (OISE/UT) – which educates teachers – could be promoting the teaching of false and biased history in its classrooms.

Canadian Jewish Congress spokesperson Simon Rosenblum would like some reassurance that the Centre for Anti Racism Studies, headed by Prof. Sherene Razack is not "hijacking legitimate anti-racism studies into a vehicle to act against the legitimate interests of the Jewish people."

Statements condemn Israel

On April 29, Razack circulated a resolution and covering letter condemning Israel.

The letter and resolution, which appear on the Internet (www.canpalnet. ca/academic.html), refer to a United Nations mission "to be dispatched to report on the possibility that massacres and crimes against humanity have been perpetrated by the Israeli army at Jenin and the old city of Nablus."

The resolution goes on to state that "many independent eyewitness accounts have spoken about 'atrocities beyond belief.'" In the covering letter, Razak encourages her colleagues "to stand up and denounce these crimes against humanity."

A recent United Nations report concluded that no massacre and no atrocities occurred in Jenin during the Israeli army incursion last April.

The UN report accuses "Palestinian militants in the camp, as elsewhere," of adopting "methods which constitute breaches of international law that have been and continue to be condemned by the United Nations," and blames Israelis

Israeli historian pessimistic about Mideast peace

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Benny Morris is one of Israel's most important new historians. A liberal, he backed the 1993 Oslo accords and supported the right of Palestinians to statehood.

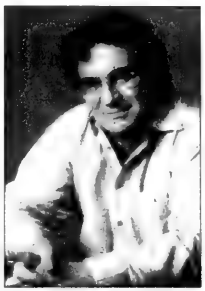
Having concluded that the Palestinians were prepared for a two-state solution, he was optimistic that the Arab-Israeli dispute could be resolved through peaceful means.

But today, two years after the collapse of the Camp David summit and the eruption of the second Palestinian uprising, Morris is deeply pessimistic.

A professor of Middle East history at Ben-Gurion University of the Negev and the author of seven acclaimed books about Israel's perennial conflict with the Arabs, he now believes that the chances of an Israeli-Palestinian accommodation have receded.

"The Palestinians don't accept and don't want a Jewish state," he said bluntly in a talk at Holy Blossom Temple last week sponsored by the Canadian Institute for Jewish Research in Montreal. "They want Palestine to themselves."

As Morris sees it, the current Palestinian leadership, headed by Yasser Arafat, rejects partition and a two-state solution and regards Israel as a latter-day Crusader state, a passing "infidel presence" that can be eliminated by means of violence, attrition and demography.



Benny Morris

Morris, a Sabra whose birth coincides with Israel's establishment in 1948, once thought that the conflict was well on its way toward resolution.

Egypt and Jordan had signed peace treaties with Israel in 1979 and 1994, respectively. The Palestinians had been ejected from their base in Lebanon. Their support of Iraq during the 1991 Gulf War had grievously weakened them.

"Perhaps," he mused, "the Palestinians had woken up to the reality of history."

Maybe they would follow in Egypt's and Jordan's footsteps.

Morris, who was imprisoned during the first intifadah for refusing to serve as a soldier in the West Bank, was further heartened by his perception that the Oslo peace process seemed to breaking down Arab-Israeli animus.

Another cause for optimism, he explained, revolved around his belief that Israel's peace talks with Syria, sputtering though they were, might yet lead to a breakthrough.

Yet, as he watched developments unfold, Morris' confidence was badly shaken.

The president of Syria, Hafez Assad, rebuffed an unprecedented offer by Israel's former prime minister, Ehud Barak, under which Israel would withdraw from virtually every square foot of the occupied Golan Heights in exchange for a peace treaty.

Some months later at Camp David, Arafat rejected a deal that would have given the Palestinians about 90 per cent of the West Bank, all of Gaza and a foothold in eastern Jerusalem in return for ending the conflict with Israel.

Subsequently, Arafat turned down a proposal from then U.S. president Bill Clinton, endorsed by Barak, sweetening Israel's Camp David offer.

Arafat did not submit a counter-offer, perhaps because Israel was familiar with the oft-reiterated Palestinian demand for a full Israeli withdrawal from the West Bank and Gaza, comprising about 22 per cent of Mandate Palestine.

Instead, Arafat insisted on the "right of return," demanding that millions of Palestinian refugees in neighbouring Arab countries be granted the right to return to their former homes in Israel.

"Both sides understood that the implementation of the 'right of return' would result in the destruction of Israel as a Jewish state," said Morris. Through demography, he added, the Palestinians hoped to gain a majority for an Islamic state to supplant Israel.

In the wake of Ariel Sharon's controversial visit to the Temple Mount in east Jerusalem in September 2000, Palestinian riots broke out. "The rioting evolved into a full-scale terrorist war," said Morris. This, in essence, was the Palestinian response to Barak's and Clinton's diplomatic overtures.

Morris said the Palestinian reaction was in keeping with a rejectionist mindset: they rejected a 1937 British partition proposal, a 1947 United Nations partition plan and a 1978 autonomy plan embedded in the Camp David agreement signed by Israel and Egypt.

He thinks the line of Palestinian rejectionism can be traced back to the arrival of European Jewish/Zionist settlers in Palestine in the early 1880s.

What also disheartens Morris is the brutal nature of the current intifadah, characterized by suicide bombings against Israeli civilians.

He argues that Palestinian society supports these attacks – not because Palestinians want to eject Israelis from the territories but because they seek to destroy Israel altogether.

This perception of Palestinian goals led him to the conclusion that there is a basic asymmetry in Palestinian and Israeli attitudes.

The Zionist movement generally embraces partition, but Palestinian nationalism does not. "During the early 1990s, the Palestinians appeared ready for partition, but in their hearts, they don't accept a two-state solution."

Morris, whose books run the gamut from The Birth of the Palestinian Refugee Problem, 1947-49 to Righteous Victims: A History of the Zionist-Arab Conflict, 1881-1999, is not entirely pessimistic.

Peace is still possible, provided the Palestinians reassess their hostile view of Israel, waive the "right of return" and stop resorting to terrorism.

Most Israelis, he said, still cling to the hope that the Palestinians will be satisfied with a two-state solution.

But in almost the same breath, Morris succumbs to a feeling of hopelessness. Even if Israel and the Palestinians reach a settlement, the agreement will not hold. "Hamas will take over and tear [it] up."

Morris, who has been described as saying that Israel's occupation of the territories is immoral, contends that Palestinian moderates such as Sari Nusseibeh are marginal and do not represent Palestinian public opinion.

> 'The Palestinian peace camp does not exist in practical terms'

"Arafat and Saddam Hussein set the tone, not Nusseibeh."

And he observed: "The Palestinian peace camp does not exist in practical terms. Palestinian liberals are in the closet, fearing assassination."

Morris, who referred to himself as a "lowly academic," said that the removal of Jewish settlements in the territories would motivate the Palestinians to end their conflict with Israel. But even if Israel withdraws from the West Bank and Gaza, the Palestinians will make additional demands.

"The problem is not the occupation of the territories, but Israel itself."

Turning to Israeli Arabs, Morris warned that they pose a future threat. "I fear they will be part of the Palestinian struggle against Israel... They will growingly become a time bomb and a fifth column."

The pull of Palestinian nationalism, he noted, will supersede the economic benefits Israeli Arabs enjoy.

Asked during a question-and-answer session if Israel has the inner strength to withstand the looming challenges to its existence, Morris replied, "I don't know."

But then he pointed out that Israeli residents of Tel Aviv left in droves during the Gulf War, and suggested that Israel may not be as resilient as it was during the War of Independence.

Camp brings Israel to Canadian children

By ANNA MORGAN
Staff Reporter

For Asher, Daniel, Jonti and Sharon, it's all in the delivery.

While campers swam and water-skied around us on Haliburton's Moose Lake, the four Canada-Israel Experience (CIE) professionals stressed the need to implement educational summer programs that are also fun.

Sharon Shwartzman, who began her teaching career as an educational officer in the Israeli army, explained that "camps have become the second classroom as far as Jewish education is concerned."

With so much happening around them, it's important to bring Israel to these kids in a creative way, Asher Afriat said, adding that the activities have to feel as if they're a part of their camp lives.

The four Israeli educators brought the CIE program, organized with the support of the Jewish Agency for Israel and other groups from across the communal spectrum, to seven camps in Quebec and Ontario this summer.

At B'nai Brith Camp Northland, Afriat, Shwartzman, Jonti Blackman and Daniel Erlick converted a wood cabin playhouse into a caravan of games about Jerusalem.

For almost two hours, the 12 year-old campers – dressed mainly in T-shirts, sweatpants and baseball caps – rotated around eight different play stations in order to collect points.

The six teams of seven kids built sand mountains, deciphered ancient Hebraic codes, found keys to the gates of the Old City and listened to modern Israeli music as they scurried between the checkpoints.

The children are at each station about eight minutes so that they don't have time to get distracted or lose attention, Shwartzman pointed out.

They don't even realize that they're learning about the geography, history, culture and sociology of Jerusalem, she said.

The counsellors decide which activities to choose from their stock of informal learning activities after discussions with the camp directors.

"We've built a large pool of programs about Israel, but the directors guide us so that we can choose the right one for each camp," Afriat said.

In the future, Shwartzman hopes to be able to spend more time training Canadian staff so that they can be more involved in offering similar kinds of programming.

Given the current violence in the Middle East, the four Israelis realize that many parents are reluctant to send their children to Israel.

In today's environment, Blackman pointed out that it has become even more important for Jewish children to be able to find meaning in their heritage. The challenge for these CIE professionals is to simulate the Israel experience so that the campers will have a deeper understanding of the situation.

"It is important for us to be here to discuss the issues presented by the campers and staff," Erlick said.

Erlick said that "some of the older kids ask tough questions. They really want to understand the current situation."

On the waterfront docks at Camp Northland are (from left) Jonti Blackman, Daniel Erlick, Asher Afriat and Sharon Shwartzman. [Anna Morgan photo]

The four counsellors, who live in and around Jerusalem, come from different backgrounds and bring varying political points of view to the discussions. Afriat was born in Jerusalem, Shwartzman in London, England; Erlick made aliyah from Brooklyn six years ago, and Blackman is originally from South Africa.

"Many Canadian counsellors are surprised to see that we're all different – and that we're not all religious," Blackman said.

"Kids here see a reflection of Israeli society when they meet us," he said. "They hear that there are nuances and shades to all the issues."

We were wrong; the perversity worsens

Nothing, we thought last year, could more poignantly illustrate the hollow morality and perverse empty posturing of the United Nations than the ascension of Syria to the 15-member Security Council of the United Nations. Sitting on the council, which carries the UN's "primary responsibility for the maintenance of international peace and security," was one of the countries on earth most responsible for the sabotaging of international peace and security. Had the appointment not been an affront to decency, it might have been quite droll.

According to media reports last week, we now face the very real possibility that Libya may be appointed to head the UN Commission of Human Rights. Africa, whose turn it is to nominate the head of the UN Commission of Human Rights for next year, has nominated Libya.

"We the peoples of the United Nations... reaffirm faith in fundamental human rights, in the dignity and worth of the human person, in the equal rights of men and women and of nations large and small." These words appear in the preamble of the UN charter. The protection of human rights was deemed so important by the framers of the UN charter, that it is explicitly mentioned in six additional Articles.

Very few are the countries on earth whose governments are the complete and utter antithesis of the reaffirmation of "human rights," or "the dignity and worth of the human person." But Libya is one of them.

Its long-standing dictator, Col. Moammar Gadhafi, oppresses his people and presides over a totalitarian society in which any dissent is denied and human rights are but a far-off chimera.

It appears our conclusion about the UN last year was wrong. The perverse posturing there may be worsening.

Last week, in this space, we urged the government of Canada to "rebuke [Yasser] Arafat for trying to conscript it in his transparent con game" of interceding with Israel and the United States "to save the peace accord" that he signed with his "partner Yitzhak Rabin."

After the edition went to press but before it arrived in the mail to our subscribers, Deputy Prime Minister and Finance Minister John Manley publicly rejected Arafat's phony pleading. It may not have been a rebuke, per se, to the leader of the Palestinian Authority, but the point was expressed to him with sufficient clarity. Canada will not fall for nor be a party to Arafat's predictable ploys.

The current situation was of his own making, Manley told Arafat, and he – Arafat – alone would have to deal with its consequences.

We commend Manley for his prompt, definitive response to the Palestinian leader.

Now, if only he would act as definitively to persuade Solicitor General Lawrence MacAulay to include Hamas, Hezbollah, Islamic Jihad, the PFLP and the Al Aqsa Martyrs Brigade on the list of "entities knowingly engaged in terrorist activity."

CBC ombudsman answers CJN

Your editorial, "Public broadcaster, public hypocrisy" (CJN, July 25) was both inaccurate and unfair.

The editorial made the claim that I hold the view that asking the CBC's reporters to describe suicide bombers as terrorists amounted to asking the CBC to take sides with Israel. That's wrong. The truth is I have no problem with having the suicide bombing of civilians described as an act of terrorism.

It's unfortunate that your newspaper did not bother to check with me before writing an editorial based on the mis-statement of my views in Eric Lawee's article July 19 in the National Post. As I told Lawee, there's nothing in CBC journalism policy that prevents the public broadcaster's journalists from calling a spade a spade or a terror attack a terror attack. I also said journalists should only make this kind of editorial judgment once they had gathered all the relevant facts. Your editorial described this approach as "wholly unacceptable."

In his article, Lawee failed to report the context of my remarks, which were made as a specific reference to those who would have the CBC routinely refer to all Palestinians in this conflict as terrorists. I noted that neither side in this dispute respects the definition of terrorism as the deliberate targeting of civilians. The Israel Defence Forces, for example, routinely brands as terrorists those who attack either civilians or soldiers. There's a tendency there to equate Palestinian resistance with terrorism.

So my view is that the CBC's journalists should beware. They would indeed be taking sides if they embraced holus-bolus the way the word terrorist is misused by Israeli authorities. Just as they would also be taking sides, if they adopted holus-bolus, Palestinian allegations about state terrorism. While I have urged the CBC's programmers to be careful with their words, I have never found fault with any CBC journalist who has described one of these attacks on civilians as a terror attack. And while the terms "terrorist" and "terrorist attack" have been used in CBC's coverage of the Middle East, there's clearly a preference in daily news reporting not to label the actions of either side in this dispute. The preference is to provide purely factual accounts and to let the listener and viewer be the judge.

This is not only the case at the CBC, it's also the case at many of the world's leading news organizations, which, like the CBC, generally discourage daily news reporters from characterizing the people and events they are assigned to cover. It's true that there are inconsistencies, that while the attackers of the World Trade Center have been labelled as terrorists, the exploding humans, the "H-Bombers" of the Middle East, tend not to be.

While I agree that the public broadcaster should be consistent in its handling of stories about terrorism, I would like to paraphrase what my colleague Michael Getler, ombudsman for the Washington Post, said in a recent column about his newspaper: Despite some lapses and shortcomings, my sense is that fair-minded listeners and viewers would be very well informed by the CBC's coverage during the course of this lengthy conflict.

Lawee responds to CBC ombudsman

David Bazay's complaint about my citation of him in a single instance merely spotlights the sort of well-honed evasions found throughout his correspondence, while deflecting attention from his failure to adequately address the points raised in my article and The CJN editorial.

How nice that Bazay has "no problem" if a Palestinian suicide-bombing that blows people to smithereens is called an act of terrorism. How admirable that he has never faulted a journalist for doing so. For my part, I've not found a single case where a CBC journalist describes a Palestinian attack this way despite the fact that I have reviewed scores of CBC accounts of murderous Palestinian assaults on Israeli civilians.

If calling murderers of Israeli civilians terrorists is "no problem," why do the CBC's journalists not do so, or hardly ever do so? They prefer to give "purely factual accounts," Bazay says. Using the word terrorist is a "kind of editorial judgment" that reporters should make "once they had gathered all the facts." But surely it is not editorializing to call someone who takes an innocent life with malice aforethought a murderer, or to call a person who unlawfully takes money a robber. It is simply, as Bazay would say, "to call a spade a spade."

No one is asking for "holus-bolus" applications of the terrorist label, only a consistent one based on the widely accepted definition of terrorism Bazay endorses. (In his CJN letter, Bazay does admit to the CBC's inconsistencies such as in referring to the attackers of the World Trade Center as terrorists, then shrugs at the blatant double-standard.)

Bazay is right about one thing: I should have called more attention to the straw man he sets up in his essay when he speaks of those who ask the CBC to "routinely refer to all Palestinians in this conflict as terrorists." That CBC journalists routinely fail to brand all Palestinians involved in the conflict as terrorists is, of course, hardly the problem. It's that they don't routinely refer to any of them this way, including homicide murderers who slaughter civilians, especially women and children.

Yes, the CBC should "routinely refer" to Palestinians who pump bullets into a cowering five-year-old in her bed or blow up students in a university cafeteria as terrorists. When it does, the most glaring of "lapses and shortcomings" in its Middle East coverage will finally have been fixed.

Canadian pro-Israeli academics must challenge Mideast distortion

By DAVID GOLDBERG and TILLY SHAMES

For the better part of two years, various sectors of the Jewish community in Canada have participated in efforts to counter the systematic global campaign to delegitimize the State of Israel. But one sector still to become fully engaged is the pro-Israel community at Canadian universities and colleges.

The absence of a co-ordinated effort by scholars to articulate a concerted pro-Israel viewpoint has emboldened Israel's enemies at many Canadian academic institutions. Efforts have been made to manipulate important academic institutions toward adopting a decidedly anti-Israel corporate perspective. Without an engaged group of pro-Israel academics clearly present on campus, the distortion of facts about the Middle East crisis will go unchallenged, poisoning the overall quality of post-secondary education in Canada.

Clearly, the unfair scholarly treatment of Israel is today most pronounced in Europe, as witnessed in the controversial case of two Israeli academics dismissed from their work with the University of Manchester on the grounds that Israel "has gone beyond just war crimes." Even on major university and college campuses in the United States, there have been noisy anti-Israel demonstrations, involving both students and faculty, along with petitions to boycott Israeli scholars, declare Israel a "racist apartheid state" and divest holdings in Israel.

Canadian institutions, however, are not immune from this disturbing phenomenon. Though sometimes more genteel than their European and American counterparts, some Canadian-based professors have shown no compunction about using every tool at their disposal to promote an anti-Israel agenda.

For instance, in a recent issue of the Bulletin of the Canadian Association of University Teachers (CAUT), Queen's University sociologist and longtime Palestinian activist Elias Zureik published an article ostensibly describing how steps taken by Yasser Arafat's Palestinian Authority (PA) to create a modern educational system were disrupted by the past 23 months of violence.

However, Zureik's article is actually a thinly-veiled full-frontal assault on Israel's legitimacy, specifically on Israeli "occupation" and "oppression" as the cause of all ills affecting the Palestinian people. There is no reference to the steps taken by Israel to modernize the educational system in the West Bank and Gaza Strip after 1967, including building the first universities and colleges for the Palestinians, even in the absence of peace. Nor is there an acknowledgement of the fact that, instead of devoting resources to the development of an educational curriculum that would inculcate support for peace among Palestinian children, the PA cynically re-directed vast sums of international donations away from education and toward their efforts to destroy Israel militarily.

However, as disconcerting as Zureik's attack on Israel is, it is the decision of CAUT to run such a blatantly polemical article in its bulletin that we find truly troublesome.

One might well ask what business a journal devoted to facilitating professional communication among Canadian university teachers has in delving into the contentious Israeli-Palestinian conflict. And even if the editors of the CAUT bulletin could justify entering into the Middle East fray, would it not have been more appropriate, more in line with the academic principle of the free exchange of competing ideas, for them to ensure that all sides of the debate were expressed? Publishing Prof. Zureik's screed against Israel as a stand-alone article compromised the bulletin's integrity.

An even more glaring example of the attempted manipulation of a Canadian academic institution for anti-Israel purposes relates to the petition condemning "the current atrocities perpetrated against the Palestinians by the Israeli state and army" that was disseminated on the letterhead of the Centre for Integrative Anti-Racism Studies at the Ontario Institute for Studies in Education (OISE). It is bad enough when an individual academic brings disrepute to his or her university by attaching its name to a piece of anti-Israel polemic; it is fundamentally wrong for an employee of a respectable academic institution such as OISE to imply that her hatred toward Israel is officially endorsed by that institution.

OISE has publicly disassociated itself from the inappropriate political activities of Sherene Razack, the anti-racism centre's director. However, the apparent ease with which Razack almost succeeded in manipulating OISE for nefarious purposes should be of significant concern to everyone.

Without a strong reaction from the Jewish community, as in the OISE case, scholars will have free rein to use their professional titles and university campuses as covers for their anti-Israel rhetoric. A case in point is R. Michael Neumann, an associate professor of philosophy at Peterborough's Trent University.

Writing for an avowedly radical left-wing Web site called "CounterPunch.org," the essence of Neumann's inflammatory argument is encapsulated in the nonsensical title of his article, "It's hard to say what's so bad about Israel." Some of his more outrageous statements include the following: "Israel is a growing evil whose end is not in sight"; "The new state accorded full rights only to its Jewish inhabitants, and defeated its Arab opponents both in battle and in a propaganda campaign that effectively concealed Israeli racism and aggression"; "...by the mid-1970s, Israel's crimes were no longer the normal atrocities of nation-building nor an excessive sort of self-defence. They represented a cold-blooded, calculated, indeed an eagerly embraced choice of war over peace"; "Israel stands out among other unpleasant nations in the depth of its commitment to gratuitous violence and nastiness: this you expect to find among skinheads rather than nations"; and "What matters here is not Israel's arrogance, but its stature. Israel stands right in the spotlight and crushes an entire people. It defies international protests and resolutions as no one else can. Only Israel, not, say, Indonesia or even the United States, dares proclaim: 'Who are you to preach morality to us? We are morality incarnate!'"

Let us be very clear on one point: while we find Neumann's argument completely reprehensible, we do not deny him the right to express his opinion, for that is the cornerstone of the intellectual tradition. What we find truly disconcerting is the danger that, in the absence of a strong pro-Israel voice to balance theirs, Neumann and his cohorts at other Canadian post-secondary institutions will continue to skew the intellectual debate about Israel and the Middle East.

The serious case of Concordia University notwithstanding, we can perhaps take some solace from the fact that the challenges confronting supporters of Israel (students and faculty alike) at Canadian universities and colleges pale by comparison to those faced by their counterparts in Europe and the United States. Nevertheless, as we have suggested, there is evidence that the anti-Israel animus that is driving the agendas of foreign academic institutions is beginning to emerge in Canada.

It is the obligation of the organized national Jewish community to encourage Jewish academics and their students, many of whom are feeling increasingly isolated even on larger Canadian campuses, to speak out confidently on Israel's behalf. Resources should be devoted to ensuring that they have access to accurate and timely information about what is occurring in Israel and in neighbouring Arab and Muslim countries. Speaking tours by qualified Israeli scholars should be organized, not only for the larger metropolitan universities, say, in Toronto, Montreal, Ottawa and Vancouver, but also for smaller or more isolated campuses such as Dalhousie, Trent, Waterloo, Saskatoon, Lethbridge and Victoria. Steps should be taken to co-ordinate with local universities the establishment of permanent Chairs in Israel and Jewish studies. The defunct program of academic exchanges between Canadian and Israeli post-secondary institutions should be revived, expanded and institutionalized. In addition, a group of dedicated Canadian academics (Jewish and non-Jewish alike) should be established to undertake research and publish material that sensitizes readers to Israel's perspective.

In Belgium, above, and in New York City, below, communities rally in support of Israel.

There is no shortage of ideas for how to activate (or in some cases, re-activate) Canada's pro-Israel academic community. And this is most certainly not to diminish the important work that a handful of Canadian scholars are already doing on Israel's behalf. For example, as reported in the Aug. 15 issue of The CJN, York University prof. Candace Séguinot resigned from her position associated with the University of Manchester to protest the firing of the two Israeli professors.

What is required is a concerted effort to encourage academics from across the country to become fully engaged in the debate from an Israeli perspective. Nothing less than the integrity of the intellectual discourse among Canadian scholars is at stake.

When will it ever end?

Rabbi Gunther Plaut in Toronto

When I hear a broadcast or read the morning newspaper, I am, like many of you who read this column, listening for the moment when Israel will be mentioned. When I hear the introduction, I fear it will be a tale of violence. Violence seems to be the envelope in which so much news from Jerusalem has enfolded.

We rarely are informed about significant inventions that have come out of Israel. Few readers know about the country's scientific advances of worldwide importance or its literary achievements of significance. Meanwhile, the public impression remains the same: Israel is a place where various forms of violence are perpetrated much of the time.

That is, unfortunately, not surprising. Look at a map produced in an Arab country and you will not even find an indication that there is such a country as Israel. In omitting its presence, the map expresses what appears to be an almost universal Arab wish – that Israel disappear altogether. With that in mind, why print a map that still contains it?

Meanwhile, how often do I read of peace negotiations that are being planned between Israel and the Arabs? My heart would rejoice if they showed any promise of success, but alas, they do not, and they certainly will not as long as the Arab community has an almost overwhelming desire to see Israel disappear.

As pessimistic as it sounds, how can Israel contemplate peace with a partner that wishes, above all, its destruction? Peace, in any meaningful sense, is an arrangement of parties who recognize the legitimacy of each other's existence. But when that is absent, peace can only mean a temporary suspension of violence.

It would be helpful if discussions about the Middle East would focus on this regrettable situation. Israelis wish for peace more than any other nation in the world but, unfortunately, it is surrounded by countries that wish for its destruction.

You read, very rarely, of this bitter truth. Instead, you are fed a diet of generalities that presumes that if Israel would only make peace, all would be well. It is a naive attitude. As long as Israel's neighbours wish for its ultimate disappearance, peace is an empty hope. Some would call this way of thinking a form of desperate pessimism, but I would rather name it a regretful realism. I wish it were otherwise.

Hitting the right notes

It's hard to say who felt the most impact from the visit: the guests or their hosts. What's clear is that those on both sides will long remember the experience, and with good reason.

Earlier this month, the Jerusalem Youth Orchestra (JYO) returned home after a 10-day concert tour in North America. Comprised of 37 gifted teenage musicians, the group created a lot more than just beautiful sounds during their stay in the United States and Canada.

Robert Sarner in Jerusalem

When the orchestra members arrived in New York at the start of their tour, little did they expect that one of the highpoints in their trip would be a stopover in a remote wilderness area.

Given the situation in terror-shaken Jerusalem, tour organizers felt providing the troupe with a day of true peace would do them a world of good. Such was the thinking behind their visit to Ontario's Algonquin Park.

The first stop in Algonquin was Camp Tamakwa on South Tea Lake, which invited the JYO for an afternoon of fun and relaxation. At their own initiative, the orchestra put on a superb performance led by conductor Albert Piamenta at the camp's lakeside amphitheatre.

Only a week earlier, the JYO had left Israel, where a setting such as Algonquin Park is unthinkable. The ensemble arrived at Tamakwa from Ottawa, where they had heard news of the terrorist atrocity at Jerusalem's Hebrew University. Several of the musicians had relatives there at the time.

"Coming to camp was a much-appreciated break for us," says Lital Belinko, 17, who plays the clarinet. "The day before was so stressful because we heard about the attack back home at Hebrew University. My sister studies there and I was so afraid something happened to her until I finally spoke to my family in Jerusalem. At Tamakwa, it was so peaceful and we felt so much warmth and support from everybody."

Tamakwans, too, were touched by the visit.

"It really moved me," says Marc Crane, a 15-year-old camper from Michigan. "I know Israel is going through such tough times and it must be so hard for people there, especially for kids our age. It was beautiful to see them in a setting free of worries."

Senior directors David Bale and Vic Norris invited the JYO to Tamakwa in a symbolic show of solidarity with Israel.

"There was something special about the orchestra's visit," says Norris. "You could just feel and see in the eyes of the kids and in the way they played the music how important it was for them to experience life outside Israel and to enjoy such a beautiful safe haven. When they played Hatikvah, it was a very emotional moment for all of camp."

As Tamakwa's resident family from Israel, the visit was especially poignant for my wife and me and our children.

Next in their Algonquin experience, the JYO left Tamakwa for the nearby Bonita Lake cottage, where Roots owners and Tamakwa alumni, Don Green and Michael Budman, hosted the visitors for dinner, a sleepover at the site and various water sports the next morning.

"It gave Michael and me great satisfaction to open our place at Bonita to these kids so they could have such a relaxing time and real-life experience in Algonquin Park," says Green. "Especially when you think of what these kids live with in Israel every day as compared to how lucky people are in Canada. They deserved every second of it."

Exactly 24 hours after arriving in Algonquin, the JYO's dream-like stay at Tamakwa and Bonita ended with the orchestra's departure for Toronto and their final performance of the tour. Three days later, the JYO returned to Israel where several of the musicians must now begin their military service.

The Algonquin visit was organized by Eli Rubinstein, who heads Toronto's Congregation Habonim. He was with the JYO kids into the wee hours of the night at Bonita as they played music, danced and sang – all for their own enjoyment.

"There's not a hint of aggression in their souls," says Rubinstein. "Yet when they return to Israel, some of them will have to go into the army to face an implacable enemy whose only goal is to destroy them. It's very sad. Take any of these kids and if you were to give them the choice between a gun and a musical instrument, they'll choose a musical instrument any day of the week."

1971 at Hebrew U - personal recollections

The depravity with which Palestinian terrorists destroyed a cafeteria at Hebrew University on July 31, killing eight people and wounding dozens, was morally indistinct from hundreds of other terror attacks. Terrorists employing the same type of brutality have murdered other teenagers in discos, restaurants, markets and buses.

Gerald Steinberg in Jerusalem

This was also not the first time Hebrew U has been targeted. More than 30 years ago, "General" Yasser Arafat's terrorists bombed a cafeteria on the university's Givat Ram campus (built after Mt. Scopus was cut off from the rest of Jerusalem in 1948).

The echoes of that attack were still reverberating when I came to Hebrew U in July 1971 – one of a few thousand overseas students who arrive every year to enjoy the treasures of the Hebrew language and experience life as an Israeli. Four years after the 1967 war brought an end to the Jordanian-Palestinian occupation and desecration of Jewish Jerusalem, the campus on Mt. Scopus, which had remained an island under tenuous Israeli control from 1948 to 1967, was being restored and expanded.

The campus was a massive construction site, with dozens of new buildings going up to house classrooms and research institutes. A system of underground tunnels was also being built to connect these new buildings and provide easy access to buses in the summer heat and winter rain. At the time, with the experiences of the 1967 war still fresh, some overly creative students imagined that these massive concrete tunnels would be used as military strongholds to prevent an Arab effort to retake Jerusalem. Israel was still threatened from all sides, and peace was a very distant and abstract concept. The façade of "normalcy" and wishful thinking that formed the environment in which the illusions of Oslo developed 20 years later had yet to emerge.

Mirroring the physical reconstruction outside, the new classrooms, libraries, student dormitories – architecturally uninspiring and functionally minimalist (not in a positive sense) – became incubators for the Jewish renaissance.

Twenty-three years after the restoration of independence in the Land of Israel, Israelis and Jewish students from overseas intensely debated the direction that this renaissance should take, and how 4,000 years of very rich learning, tradition and debates on the key questions of life should be applied to moulding the future of the Jewish people.

From our vantage point above Jerusalem, we looked out on our history every day. With the Temple Mount and the Old City on one side, and the Judean desert on the other, we were constantly reminded of our personal obligation to ensure Jewish survival.

In this atmosphere, Palestinian terrorism was always a danger, and part of the precarious environment, but far from a dominating factor. During the year that I spent as an overseas student at Hebrew U, there were airplane hijackings (Sabena); an airport massacre conducted by hired killers from the Japanese Red Army; numerous bombings in downtown Jerusalem; the massacre at the Munich Olympics; and other attacks. But the choice then, as now, was clear: if we wanted to survive as a people, we had to continue with our mission, regardless of the attacks.

Tens of thousands of students have participated in similar programs on other Israeli campuses, and many stayed to become part of the Jewish renaissance and to contribute to the triumphs of Zionism. We have become fully integrated and have assumed leadership positions in the Israel Defence Forces, in the hi-tech industries, and everywhere else. The graduates of these programs are now teaching at the newer universities – Tel Aviv, Bar Ilan, Haifa, and Ben-Gurion – matching, and often overtaking, Hebrew U's academic achievements and contributions to Jewish learning.

And along with so many other Israelis, some of us have paid with our lives, including some of the latest victims of Palestinian hatred and brutality who were murdered in Hebrew U's Frank Sinatra cafeteria. But three decades of experience have also demonstrated that the commitment to Israel and Jewish survival will not been shaken by terrorism. Now, as was the case 30 years ago, students will continue to come, regardless of the risks, to make their contribution.

The Kirshner File

Greenspon takes the helm of the Globe

When Edward Greenspon strode into his functional office on the dimly-lit editorial floor of The Globe and Mail, I jokingly mentioned that he had made some interesting career strides since our last meeting little more than two years ago.

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

"I just moved across the hall," he quipped, a tentative smile wreathing his bearded face.

Well, not exactly.

Exactly one month ago, Greenspon, 45, started work as the Globe's new editor-in-chief, succeeding Richard Addis. After 16 years in jobs ranging from business writer to Ottawa bureau chief, he had made the spectacular leap to the pinnacle of Canada's self-styled national daily, the first Jew to hold that coveted, prestigious position.

In May 2000, when I last interviewed him, Greenspon, born and raised in Montreal and a graduate of Wagar High School, had just been seconded to launch globeandmail.com, the paper's breaking news Internet site. Within about a year of that appointment, he was writing a national affairs column from Ottawa. By the spring of this year, the rumour mills were churning out speculation that he would succeed Addis, a British import.

On April 5, a day after Greenspon received the Hyman Solomon Award for excellence in public policy journalism, Phillip Crawley, the publisher of the Globe, asked to see him. Crawley, having closely followed the trajectory of his rise, offered him Addis' job. "I was honoured and delighted," Greenspon said.

"I appointed Ed because he was the outstanding candidate," Crawley explained. "Having excelled in all his jobs, it was an easy choice for me to make, especially considering his strong intelligence and deep knowledge of Canada."

Crawley, who did not conduct a formal search for Addis' successor, added: "Ed has a strong sense of what the Globe can and should do as a national newspaper, both in terms of reflecting the diversity of such a large and increasingly multi-ethnic country, and in terms of offering a range of opinions which inform and enrich the debate on the choices we all face as Canadian residents. His experience means the paper's coverage of policy issues will be enhanced."

Greenspon, who describes his job as "special and wonderful," feels the weight of responsibility as he takes charge of "an institution of great importance to the country." Yet, he observed, "I honestly can say I haven't felt intimidated or overwhelmed."

In fact, Greenspon, the co-author of two books on Canadian politics, is ready for the challenge and confident of his management team. To prepare himself for the task, he submitted to a series of intensive briefings, shadowed Addis, reflected long and hard on his objectives, and jotted down his ideas in colour-coded binders.

On his first day as editor, he arrived at 7: 15 a.m., an hour earlier than planned because he had set his alarm clock too early. "My office was locked and the newsroom was empty," he said, displaying a look of mock bafflement. "Where was everyone?" As the day wore on, he chatted with reporters and editors, renewed old acquaintances and presided over his first story meeting. As he made the rounds, he felt quite pumped up and excited, taller than his five-foot-eight height.

On day two, July 23, Greenspon appeared on Canada AM, then delivered a "town hall" speech to the staff. He described the Globe as a paper of "authority and integrity," saying he hoped to build "a truly" national newspaper. He warned them that Toronto's newspaper war continues, pitting the Globe against the National Post and the Toronto Star. He talked about reaching "the next level of excellence," from good to great. He described himself as a "voice for change," and said that the presentation of news is "our number-one priority."

Comparing himself to an orchestra conductor, he observed, "You are the players. You make the music. But the conductor holds the baton to make sure we produce a symphony and not a cacophony." In addition, he declared that he intended to be an "activist" editor, assured them that there would not be radical changes, since the Globe already had a "winning formula," and informed them that he would essentially leave the paper's basic design intact.

But although he has barely warmed his seat, Greenspon has already made changes. He hired the Post's celebrated columnist, Roy McGregor, to be "the voice of the country." He plans to install a business columnist in Calgary and a Report On Business reporter in Atlantic Canada. More to the point, the Globe will be robust in covering vital Canadian issues, such as the state of the overstrained health care system.

Further ahead, he intends to expand international coverage, though he concedes that foreign bureaus, including the Jerusalem bureau, are costly to maintain, and to reshuffle the lineup of overseas correspondents and editorial board writers.

When the conversation turned to the Middle East, he said, "I'm not the Jewish editor of the Globe. I'm the editor who's Jewish." Having unburdened himself of this weight, Greenspon said he understands the Jewish community's interest in and attachment to Israel. The Globe's coverage of the Middle East will be fair and realistic, recognizing Israel's yearning for security and the Palestinians' national aspirations. "We will not be a friend of terrorism."

Edward Greenspon

Greenspon does not think that the North American media, in general, is anti-Israel, but he believes that some journalists were too hasty in condemning Israel for a "massacre" in the Jenin Palestinian refugee camp that never even happened.

Greenspon joined the Globe as a business reporter in 1986 after graduating from Carleton University and working for the Lloydminister Times, the Regina Leader-Post and the Financial Post. He grew up in the Montreal suburbs of St. Laurent and Cote St. Luc. His late father, Mortimer, was an insurance agent and financial planner. His mother, Rosalie, is a real estate agent. Greenspon's older sister, Ina, is a teacher in California.

While he was a reporter and foreign correspondent based in London and covering pivotal events such as the end of communism in Poland and the reunification of Germany, it never occurred to Greenspon that he could be editor of the Globe one day. But as he assumed managerial posts, from managing editor of the Report On Business to deputy managing editor, he thought that it might not be an impossible dream.

A week before Greenspon came on board as editor-in-chief, David Rosenzweig, an Orthodox Jew, was murdered in Toronto. Local newspapers immediately labelled the murder as a hate crime, but the Toronto police subsequently downplayed it as a racially-motivated killing. The juxtaposition between Rosenzweig's violent death and Greenspon's impending installation as the Globe's first Jewish editor struck Greenspon.

"I thought about it," he said. "I also thought about Daniel Pearl [the Wall Street Journal reporter who was murdered by Islamic fundamentalists in Pakistan], and was glad I live in a society like Canada."

Although he is acutely aware of the rising tide of anti-Semitism in Canada and elsewhere since the outbreak of the second Palestinian uprising in September 2000, Greenspon, being an optimist, likes to believe that Rosenzweig was not murdered because he was Jewish.

"Maybe my ascension [as editor] is a symbol of the real Canada, where race and religion – the old divides – should not be factors in selecting a person for a position. Canada is a wonderful experiment in multiculturalism." He paused. "My Jewishness was never a factor, but 20, 30 years ago it would have been."

To Greenspon, "the fundamentals" of his life – family and vocation – remain unchanged and unchangeable. But he acknowledged that the need to move his wife, Janice Neil, and their children – Bailey, 12, Joshua, 10, and Jacob, 8 – from Ottawa to Toronto, scheduled for Aug. 26, will be something of a wrench, an "upending" experience.

Since Bailey's bat mitzvah is not far off, he and his wife must decide which synagogue they will join. And then there is the question of which afternoon Jewish schools the children will attend. In Ottawa, they went to the Temple Israel school.

His wife, an instructor of journalism at Carleton University, is on a six-month sabbatical. But having received offers from Toronto-based media, she must decide whether she will return to Carleton. In the meantime, the Greenspons have bought a house in the Lytton Park area of Toronto, a leafy, solidly middle-class neighbourhood between Eglinton and Lawrence.

Immensely aware of the Globe's historical niche and role in Canadian journalism, Greenspon looks upon his editorship both as a stewardship and a daily learning experience.

As he put it: "Getting a newspaper right is a never-ending job, though this newspaper is on the right track. It's a constant work in progress."

JEWISH EDUCATION
The Next Generation

Teaching Judaism in a culture obsessed with objectifying (mainly female) bodies – in which the daily rigours of cosmetics, skin care, hair care, and fragrances are religious rituals in their own right – has its challenges. As external panache replaces internal integrity as the currency of choice, the ability to persuade young Jews that the soul is the most important part of the self is under increasing fire.

Adam, a 13-year-old who held his bar-mitzvah party at Los Angeles' famous Whisky a Go Go nightclub, had this to say about his Jewish coming of age: "The bar mitzvah scene is really glamorous. I mean, for kids that can't afford it or are not as fortunate, I guess they are out of luck. People usually spend between 15 grand – 15 grand being the lowest, really low – to 90 grand. I had a glass blower and carnival games, lots of them. I had a sweatshirt maker, a make-your-own video game. I had dancers. I had a steel drum band during the appetizers. I had faked stuffed lions and parrots. I felt really good after the bar mitzvah, and I was getting a lot of play with girls."

It is possible that Adam had mastered an ironic sense of humour when he concluded that "my parents know that money ruins kids," but somehow I don't think so. (For those who think I'm making this up, I commend you to the May 25, 1997 edition of The New York Times, where, along with his comments, you will find a picture of Adam dancing at Whisky a Go Go with a woman who is, shall we say, scantily clad). Woe unto us who had to make do with a Torah reading and a modest lunch. What we seem to have missed.

For all the talk of spirituality that has flooded the media over the past 15 years, it is the way one looks and how much one carries in one's wallet that seems to be our primary educational message to the next generation. Not everyone is like Adam, of course, and there are parents who are very responsible about delineating between reality and La La Land. But somewhere in all of this we seem to have lost our way, and the corrosive effects of stressing appearance and wealth make their way past every denominational border. The impact is found among the most liberal and the most Orthodox of Jews.

As another Rosh Hashanah looms large, and the frailty of being alive has never been more obvious – with the tragic events of the past year in Israel, and even here in Toronto – the message of focusing on what ultimately matters in life seems as timely as ever. May God bless us with a renewed perspective on the important things, and the time to follow through on our newfound awarenesses.

Jewish Family Institute focuses on interpersonal relationships

By ADAM GRACHNIK
CJN Intern

A hip Toronto rabbi is using humour and principles from the Torah to give audiences across North America the tools to make their marriage great.

For the past three years, Rabbi Aryeh Pamensky has hosted an eight-week program at the Village Shul in Forest Hill, on How to Make Your Good Marriage Great.

This summer his program has become more of a stand-up routine, now that he has hit the road and begun touring the continent.

He has condensed the material – and jokes – into one- and two-day seminars, and recently he has performed 1½-hour comedy shows geared for clubs. He also appeared as a relationship expert on Politically Incorrect, with host Bill Maher.

"You'll come out of [the program] with the tools to create the marriage of your dream. You'll have a ball, you'll laugh and walk out with the marriage you always wanted," said Rabbi Pamensky, who taught at CHAT for three years, was a rabbi in congregations in Israel, South Africa and Toronto, and is now speaking about marriage full time. "It's very fun and funny."

In Toronto, the original eight-week seminar is available only at the Jewish Family Institute (JFI) at the Village Shul.

JFI's co-director Bronwyn Shepherd says the program is perfect for their organization, whose mandate is to promote positive relationships between parents, children and spouses. The group's aim is to provide families from all segments of the community with useful family-focused learning opportunities.

"[There's] such a demand that we have waiting lists," she said. "[This program] goes well with all our principles. It makes good families great."

Shepherd said the course costs $180 and "gives you the tools to communicate with each other."

Harold Nashman

Rabbi Pamensky added that it's his "dream is to stem the tide of divorce," and said couples often run into problems because they just are thrown into marriage, without an instruction manual. He explained that his program could perhaps double as one.

As an example of the tools he gives couples during his program, Rabbi Pamensky cited the use of eye contact and the importance of always taking your spouse's call.

Susan Zehavi, co-director of JFI, has taken the class. "It is dynamic and hilarious. He's so bang on and right," she said. "[I] have a greater appreciation for what's involved for a happy relationship. There is a greater sensitivity in our marriage.

"I loved his humour. My husband loved it. We started thinking again about our relationship and making each other happy," the mother of four added.

JFI was founded on the principles of the late Yetta Nashman, of whom Zehavi said, "Her entire focus was on relationships. Every person thought they were very special."

She said Nashman's husband, Harold, started the centre because he wanted to honour Yetta's morals and vision. It has grown tremendously and currently offers many family programs that Shepherd said "help people go down the right path [of marriage] the first time around."

Rabbi Pamensky's course is only for married people, but he did admit with a laugh that "women don't need as much coaching as men do."

For more information on How To Make Your Good Marriage Great or on the JFI, contact Shepherd at 416-785-1107, ext. 204, or visit www.jewishfamilyinstitute.com.

Jewish Life

A sweeping view of Jews in medicine

Jews and Medicine: An Epic Saga*, by Frank Heynick, KTAV Publishing, 2002, $39.50 (US).

Books
Bernard Baskin

There must be something special about Jewish doctors. Just consider, a tiny Jewish minority provided half the physicians in medieval Europe. Even anti-Jewish kings and bigoted clergy invariably preferred Jews as their personal physicians. Curmudgeonly H. L. Mencken, who harboured some anti-Semitic feelings, never extended those feelings to the medical field: "I go only to a Jewish doctor," he said. "Medicine requires brains, and the Jews got it. Goyim make bum doctors."

Among the most significant books on the subject were Harry Friedenwald's The Jews and Medicine (1944) and his study Jewish Luminaries in Medieval History (1946). His lucid non-technical style made for increased interest in medical history and the contribution of Jewish physicians and scientists.

Antedating Friedenwald's contribution was Dr. Julius Preuss's Biblisch-Talmudische Medizin, published in 1911. There is a recent and felicitous English translation of this useful and admired work. Until now, these volumes have been the major source of our knowledge of the Jewish contribution to medicine. These books are now joined and updated by Heynick's splendid achievement.

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

In a panoramic manner, Heynick transports the reader across continents and eras. The sweeping narrative recounts the adventures and scientific triumphs of such human benefactors as Maimonides, Freud, Ehrlich, Metchnikoff, Chain, Waksman, Salk and a host of others. These innovators pioneered the germ theory, solved the riddle of natural immunity and overcame many of the scourges that before them had carried away untold numbers of their fellow human beings.

Other advances in medical technology that bear Jewish signatures include digitalis, the world's first oral contraceptive, the invention of the laryngoscope, modern tranquilizers, the first practical birth control pill and the wonder drug, streptomycin.

Maimonides occupies an honoured place in medical history. So great was his fame that the two opposing leaders in the Wars of the Crusades – the Muslim Saladin and the Christian Richard the Lion-Hearted – bid for his services as court physician. The Rambam's loyalty lay with Saladin, who was far more tolerant of the Jews than was his Crusader adversary. His fame remained so great that for hundreds of years, even in the 20th century, sick people in search of a cure went to sleep in the Synagogue of Maimonides in Cairo or journeyed to his gravesite in Tiberias in Israel.

A feature of Heynick's book is its absorbing evocation of the various cultures and civilizations that Jews have confronted in their long journey through history. The author uses the metaphor of the eternal wandering Jew as physician as he roams from places as diverse as ancient China to modern Europe.

In a strange episode in the biblical book of Exodus, Moses places the image of a serpent upon a raised staff to cure the Israelites. In time, what became known as the staff of Asklepios became identified with medicine and its practitioners.

Impressive as were the 12 Nobel Prizes in medicine awarded to Jews in the first half of the 20th century, this number has been dwarfed by the three dozen Jews who were so honoured in the five decades after 1950. It is a good bet that in any given year, some Jewish scientist – man or woman – won or shared the Nobel in medicine. (This from a people who, even at their height, probably never constituted more than a fraction of one percent of the world's population.)

This book of 600 pages is highly recommended, both for its sheer readability as well as for its value as a work of reference.

Klezmer & the Internet — pt. 1

This is an article about tzimmes and kugel. About hot latkes and schnapps. And of course, about raisins and almonds.

No, it's not about Jewish cooking. It's about how klezmer music is cooking around the world thanks to groups like Tzimmes [http://www.tzimmes.net/], Kugel [http://members.aol.com/shawnkugel/kugel.html], Schnapps [http://goanna.cs.rmit.edu.au/~isaac/schnapps/] and many others.

There is no better place to start your hunt for just about anything klezmer than at Ari Davidow's Klezmer Shack [http://www.klezmershack.com/]. This massive site is dedicated to all aspects of contemporary klezmer music with sections devoted to KlezNews, KlezCalendar and KlezLinks. Davidow also provides a concise and readable history of the rebirth of klezmer music and defines what klezmer music is (and isn't) [http://www.klezmershack.com/articles/aboutklez.html]:

"It's balkans and blues, ancient Jewish culture and prayer and history, spirit and jazz all mixed together. Good klezmer, and the music inspired by it, demands that one dance... Some of it lies with an approach to playing that I still don't know how to describe, but includes a lot of central- and eastern-European riffs and that mysterious krechts... that soulful burst of intensity that the lead musician, often a clarinet, will play, almost like an instrumental complaint."

The late Leo Rosten explained in The Joys of Yiddish: "The word klezmer comes from two Hebrew words, clay and zimmer, meaning vessel of music or song. The idea is that the instrument, that is, the violin, clarinet, takes on human characteristics like laughing and crying. With a joyous exuberance or a soulful wailing" [http://www.users.drew.edu/jbazewic/hst/klesmer.html].

Back at Klezmer Shack, there are dozens of articles on such topics as Klezmer Drumming, Klezmer Music Theory and an piece from the San Francisco Chronicle on a city where the music is surprisingly popular: "In Today's Berlin, It's Hip to be Klezmer. The playful Jewish music is the rage in Germany's biggest city, and a community once wiped out is getting back on its feet" [http://www.klezmershack.com/contacts/klezwords.html].

Klezmer's popularity is an international phenomenon. Klezmer music has been celebrated at KlezFest in St. Petersburg, Mazltov! In Holland and the Israeli Fest in Safed. One of the largest parties will be held over the Labour Day weekend at Toronto's Harbourfront Centre with the Ashkenaz Festival [http://www.ashkenazfestival.org/]. This year's lineup includes Buenos Aires' Lerner y Moguilevsky, Poland's Cracow Klezmer Band and, of course, Canada's own Flying Bulgar Klezmer Band.

Do you want to track down a great klezmer clarinetist you heard on a CD or maybe assemble your own Klezmer band? KlezContacts has e-mail addresses for everybody who's anybody in Klezmer music [http://www.klezmershack.com/klezcontacts.html]. And you can find almost 150 Klezmer links at the Klezmer Ring. [http://s.webring.org/webring?ring=klezmer;list].

So is it time for you to try you hand at some klezmer? The Klezmaniacs say, "Yes, you too can learn how to become a klezmer musician. You too can enjoy all of the fame, wealth, and groupies which are the natural right of this status [though how much this amounts to is a question you shouldn't ask]." Here are their three tips:

1. Be born Jewish. Helpful but not essential.
2. Listen to lots of klezmer music.
3. And pick up an instrument. If you're going to be a klezmer, you shouldn't be shy.

You'll find a lot more practical advice on their webpage [http://home.att.net/~fiddlerzvi/klezmusic.html].

Even if you're not a musician, you can still feel the power of these songs. At a Web site devoted to the "King of Yiddish music," Leo Fuld [http://members.lycos.nl/jiddish/fuld01.htm], you'll find a fascinating quote attributed to one famous observer: "The Yiddish folk songs, why they are the most sincere, the most heartfelt have heard anywhere. They are the truest expression of the soul of a people." – Albert Einstein.

Belle Ewart shul hosts Israeli teens

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

Israeli teens visited Toronto. [Carolyn Blackman photo]

Yoav Picard found some things puzzling here while on a recent visit from Israel.

"When we arrived, we went to a place called the Boat Shul [an Orthodox congregation on Bathurst Street south of Lawrence Avenue]. We saw lots and lots of black hats, but we looked and looked and we didn't find any boats.

"Then we went [to the Hebrew Centre of Belle Ewart], not to a boat shul. Everywhere we looked we saw boats, and we even saw a few people with black hats."

Yoav was visiting for two weeks along with five other Israeli teenage boys, all of whom have had family members killed or badly injured in terrorist attacks. They were here as a guests of a group from the Hebrew Centre of Belle Ewart.

During their stay, they visited Ontario Place, Niagara Falls and Paramount Canada's Wonderland and went white water rafting on the Ottawa River. They also attended a Toronto Blue Jays game, and went fishing, jet skiing and boating in Belle Ewart.

Joe Fried, a Toronto lawyer who was part of the group that brought the teens to Canada, said that last summer, some of the cottagers who attend services at the Hebrew Centre, arranged to have five sefrei Torah donated to the Israeli army.

"This year, we decided to bring over the teens. We contacted One Family: Victims of Terror, an organization in Israel that works with victims of terrorism, and they chose six boys."

Outwardly, he says, the boys were high spirited and full of fun. "They were happy to take part in all the activities; it was hard to know the trauma they have been through."

Initially, however, security was a big issue, said Jack Samuel, a real estate agent who belongs to the congregation.

"They asked if our group would have a security guard with them, and whether I carried a gun. They had heard about the murder of David Rosenzweig, and they were quite concerned.

"They also wanted to know where the Arab population in the city lived, and whether non-Jews would be at Wonderland. They were unaware of the dynamics of Canadian society."

But after a few days, he said, "their fears banished and they settled into their holiday."

The visit was also a success for the teens' Canadian counterparts, he said.

"Our children saw the community reaching out to these teens, and that had a tremendous impact on them. They were able to meet kids their own age who have suffered immeasurably. They were able to put a face on people they have been reading about."

Yoav, who spoke on behalf of the other boys, said that the Belle Ewart group "brought us here, opened [their] houses and made us feel welcome. Why? Because [they] feel our pain – the terrible losses [we have suffered] and [they] want to take away from us some sadness.

"What we saw in Canada is that [we are] a family. We don't agree on everything and we are very different, but we still care about each other. We saw this in ways we did not understand before we came here."

Yoav said that people in Israel are "scared, angry and sad, but we must go on. When there are Jewish people outside Israel who care about our matsav, it helps, but still we need more.

"We need your [prayers] and we need your money. We need students to come to Israel to learn, and we need families to come to Israel to visit. The country needs tourists, the economy needs money and the Arabs and the whole world need to see that Am Yisrael is together."

He invited all Canadians to come to Israel, with one last plea. "When you do come, please do us a favour and bring with you lots of water," he said. "You have way too much here, and we are running short."

Board of Jewish Education executive director Seymour Epstein said, "As a graduate of OISE, I would be concerned that an institute that trains teachers for Ontario schools and is justifiably committed to academic freedom of speech has within its walls at least one faculty member not concerned with balance in the teaching of history."

Rosenblum said CJC was involved in discussions with OISE in April.

University of Toronto provost Shirley Neuman said the OISE/UT incident was investigated by the acting dean, Cecilia Reynolds, when the controversy surfaced in the spring. At that time, Reynolds disassociated OISE/UT from the resolution.

In a statement to The CJN, Neuman said, "We recognize that to protest a combatant's role in a war can be hurtful to some members of the community, but such a protest is not in itself racist or hate speech.

"Academic freedom means that scholars must be able to express views that are challenging while respecting academic responsibility."

In addition, Neuman said that "the petition's resolution does not constitute a formal statement of OISE/UT or of the University of Toronto.

"Persons who have added their signatures to the resolution have done so as individuals. They are free to make such a statement without fear of reprisal just as others are free to disagree with their position."

HELPING ISRAELI KIDS, ADULTS: The Canadian Friends of Jerusalem Elwyn, an organization dedicated to helping children and adults with special needs in Israel achieve independence and dignity, recently elected its new leadership at a meeting in Toronto. Cary Wolgelerenter, the incoming chair, expressed his and the organization's thanks to the longstanding leaders of the organization, Jennie Cass, Dorothy Wiener, and Syrma Kochberg. These three women, who have long dedicated themselves to improving the lives of children and adults with disabilities in Israel, served the organization from its founding, more than a decade ago. The organization sponsors annual "Scaramouche" dinners, which have remained an attraction for gastronomes and philanthropists alike. The new board decided to dedicate most of the work of the organization to Israel Elwyn's Dvora Agmon Preschool Development Center in Jerusalem, which serves more than 70 children with special needs. Seen here (from left) are Dorothy Wiener, Cary Wolgelerenter and Jennie Cass.

אנטי ישראליות אקדמית

פרופסורית מומחה ערבי בבית הספר לחינוך של אוניברסיטת טורונטו מחתימת פרופסורים מרחבי קנדה על עצומה שמגנה את פשעי ישראל כנגד פלשתין. אף מילה כמובן על מעשי הטרור היום יומיים. אפילו העובדה שהאו"ם נאלץ להודות שלא היה קבח בג'נין לא שינתה את דעתה. עד כה חתמו שלושים ומשהו פרופסורים משבע אוניברסיטאות. אפשר להניח שאלפים ראו את העצומה ובחרו שלא לחתום. ונכון, זו מדינה דמוקרטית ומותר לפרופסורית מוסלמית להביע דיעות גם כשהן מבוססות על שקרים.

לעומת זאת באירופה חתמו כאלף פרופסורים על עצומות הקוראות לנתק את היחסים המדעיים עם ישראל ולהחרים את המוסדות והחוקרים הישראלים. רק להזכירכם שבימי הטאצים היו רק כעשרים אחוז מתושבי גרמניה חברים במפלגה הנאצית, אבל ששים אחוז מן הרופאים הצטרפו ביוזמתם ל"מפלגה".

ללמדך שגיונות אינה פתוחה יותר אצל משכילים.

יש בקרב הישראלים בקנדה קבוצה לא מבוטלת של אקדמאי-רופאים, חוקרים, מרצים בכירים באוניברסיטאות. זו החזית שלנו! עמיתינו הישראלים זקוקים לכל עזרה אפשרית! צריך להזמין אותם מתי שאפשר, צריך לנסוע לכנסים בישראל, דווקא כי כל כך הרבה שפנים וכלבים אידיפאלים הפסיקו לנסוע. צריך למצוא זמן ויזמה ולספר לקולגות שלנו מה עובר על ישראל במכת הטרור.

וכולנו צריכים לקנות לראש השנה רק תוצרת הארץ.

מתנות מישראל

כותב לי בעניין זה הרב ישראל לנדא, האיש שעוסק יום ולילה באהבת ישראל:

"הנני בא בשורותי אלה לחודות לך על שורותיך בדבר העשייה של מרכז חב"ד לדוברי עברית למען ישראל וחיילה... בודאי תשמח לשמוע כי סיבוב ראשון של מבצעים אלו הסתיים החצלחה מיוחדת...חשבתי על רעיון קל ומעשי:

כל משפחה מעניקה לרגל שמחות ומועדים פעם סיר ופעם פרחים, פעם מגש ופעם אגרטל. אולי היה מקום לעודד את הציבור לסור אל חנויות הג'ודאיקה אשר חלק ניכר מהמוצרים הם מתוצרת ישראל ובכך נרויח רווח כפול....."

הימים ימי או טו טו חגים- והרעיון של הרב נשמע לי אידיאלי. אבל שישאר ביניכו.

החתונה היוונית השמנה שלי

סרט שראיתי בישראל לפני שהתחיל כאן, למרות שזה סידטה של יוצרת קנדית שהוסרטו בטורונטו. זהו סיפורה של בחורה ממשפחה יוונית שעובדת במסעדה המשפחתית וכל מה שמעניין ממנה זה להתחתן עם בחור יווני ולהביא לעולם ילדים. היא כמובן -יש לה רעיונות אחרים, מה שעושה שמח על המסך וטוב בלב. סרט שיביא לכם חיוכים. בלי פילוסופיה, נקי נקי, אבל מה-זה -חביב. מתאים לקיץ החם ביותר בהיסטוריה של העיר.

דויד גרוסמן-"בגוף אני מבינה"

אם יוצא לכם להציץ ברשימת הספרים רבי המכר בישראל, לא תוכלו שלא לראות את דויד גרוסמן בראש הרשימה. אלה הם שני סיפורים בספר אחד. הראשון הוא כמעט מונולוג של גבר שמגלה לניסתו (אשת אחיו) שהוא יודע שנים רבות שאשתו מקיימת יחסים רציניים עם גבר אחר. חסיפור השני עוסק ביחסים סבוכים בין פסיכותראפיסטית לבין נער מטופל בגיל ההתבגרות, כפי שנראו לביתה של המטפלת שהיתה אז ילדה בעצמה. שני הנושאים נשמעים בהחלט מעניינים. אבל הכתיבה של גרוסמן- מה זה קשקש: ממש שי עננן חילוני. בשבילי זה היה כמו לאכול חצץ וכדי להוריד אותו לשתות נפט. אבל שיהיה ברור: זוהי כתיבה מדוייקת, מאד מפורטת- כל מחשבה מנותחת תחת מיקרוסקופ אלקטרוני. הספר היה קשה במיוחד משום שבמקביל אני קורא את ספרו החדש והמדהים של עמוס עוז, ספר שאינך רוצה להחמיץ בו אף מילה. אבל על כך עד יסופר ב"שישאר ביניכו" עתידי.

Beth David gets new associate rabbi

Pinsker headed Reconstructionist Darchei Noam

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

"It's not such an odd thing," says Rabbi Lawrence Pinsker, referring to his recent cross-denominational career move.

Earlier this summer the 55-year-old rabbi left Darchei Noam, the 300-family Reconstructionist congregation he led for 11 years in North York, to take a position as associate rabbi at nearby Beth David B'nai Israel Beth Am Congregation, which is affiliated with the Conservative movement.

A longtime member of both the Conservative movement's Rabbinical Assembly as well as the Reconstructionist Rabbinical Association, Rabbi Pinsker described himself in a recent interview as a traditionalist in the Reconstructionist movement. He was ordained Reconstructionist, but has served three Conservative congregations (and two Reconstructionist ones) in his 26-year career.

In Toronto, his appointment is in fact unusual. It does not, however, indicate any change in Beth David's ideology, said Rabbi Philip Scheim, spiritual leader of Beth David, which has about 1,200 families.

Rabbi Pinsker has "menschlichkeit" and very good rabbinic skills, said Rabbi Scheim. "Learning was the issue, not his ordination."

The position Rabbi Pinsker is assuming is primarily educational, although he will also be involved in pastoral care, running a learning-oriented alternate service and performing rabbinic functions at life cycle events.

Rabbi Pinsker said his new position, which began Aug. 1, is "an exciting challenge."

He was already familiar with Beth David from saying Kaddish there for his father three years ago. The rabbi found the congregation's minyan to be "populated by the most wonderful people, very sweet and very generous to strangers who came in. Beth David was so warm, outgoing, good-humoured and consoling to people."

Some of the main differences between the two synagogues, as they represent their respective denominations, involve the ritual involvement of women, and the role of the rabbi.

Balancing of tradition and change is present in both movements, said Rabbi Pinsker, but the process is different, he explained. In the Reconstructionist movement, a common slogan is, "the past has a vote, but not a veto."

Likewise for Reconstructionist rabbis, who can be outvoted on matters of halachic policy, he said. Although a Reconstructionist congregation cannot require a rabbi to do anything that goes against his or her conscience, the rabbi is not mara d'atra (halachic arbiter) as is the case in Conservative congregations.

Also, the Reconstructionist movement is fully egalitarian. Conservative congregations in Toronto, for the most part, are not.

Beth David, a longtime traditional Conservative congregation, began to see changes in women's ritual participation almost two years ago, when Rabbi Scheim announced in his Rosh Hashanah sermon the gradual implementation of increased women's participation, including aliyot but not being counted as part of the minyan. The sermon was followed, uncharacteristically, with applause from the congregation.

Although that type of change is appealing to Rabbi Pinsker, who is married with three daughters, his view is that "Judaism is Judaism. It's not egalitarianism or a set of issues defined solely by a specific subgroup."

Rabbi Lawrence Pinsker

He believes in looking at what people do, he said, rather than at denominational labels. His approach, he added, has always stressed the importance of Jewish observance.

The son of eastern European Jews who identified as Orthodox, Rabbi Pinsker grew up in Chicago with a strong sense of Jewish ethics imbued in large part by his father's generous business practices.

He often mentored younger businessmen, whether they were Jewish, African American or Mexican, the rabbi recalled, and when customers couldn't afford the merchandise, he would tell them to pay when they had food on the table and their rent was paid.

But despite a strong Jewish influence at home, Rabbi Pinsker credits a Presbyterian minister with his decision to enter rabbinical school. Having studied philosophy, religion and psychology for his undergraduate and master's degrees, Rabbi Pinsker was told that he would never find a career to satisfy him unless he entered the clergy.

Yiddish, Soviet Jewish scholar came late to Judaism

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Anna Shternshis was born and raised in the Soviet Union, the product of a typically assimilated and deracinated Jewish household.

Like many Russian Jews who came of age during the Soviet era, she was only vaguely aware of her Jewish background.

As she put it: "I knew I was Jewish, but did not know exactly what it meant, except for the line in my passport. We were not practising Jews."

Considering her upbringing, Shternshis' metamorphosis into a scholar of Yiddish and Soviet Jewish culture is really nothing short of remarkable.

Still more amazing, Shternshis, 28, teaches at one of Canada's most illustrious institutions of higher learning, the University of Toronto.

Apart from teaching Yiddish language courses (beginner, intermediate and advanced), she lectures on Yiddish literature, movies and theatre.

And in September, when a new term gets under way, she will teach a new course on Soviet Jewish culture – thought to be the first course of its kind in North American academia.

"We will analyze not only how the state tried to use propaganda to convert Jews into devoted Soviet citizens," Shternshis explained, "but also how people understood, and responded to, the materials."

She will use books, pamphlets, theatre scripts, songs and oral histories to examine these issues.

On Sept. 2, she will present a lecture, titled Singing About Stalin: Yiddish Folksongs in the Soviet Union, at the Ashkenaz Festival of New Yiddish Culture.

"Music and folksongs played an important role in Soviet society in general and among Jews in particular," Shternshis said.

Officially published songs were anti-religious and encouraged Jews to become farmers. Still other songs glorified the government's achievements and served as distractions from the struggles of everyday life.

"Soviet Yiddish songs are a mirror through which we can view the cultural policies of the state toward Jews," she observed.

When she studies such songs, she looks for subliminal propaganda messages.

"Sometimes, old Yiddish songs were altered," she said. "For example, a popular lullaby by Shalom Aleichem acquired a verse, 'Sleep my child, and let comrade Stalin know you sleep well.'"

Through oral history testimonies, Shternshis gauges the popularity of such songs.

"Occasionally, officially promoted songs became popular for different reasons than expected by the government. The song Birobidzhan encouraged Jews to settle in this Far Eastern province. But oral testimonies demonstrate that Jews sang it to parody this failed settlement."

A graduate of the Russian State University for the Humanities, she was born in Moscow, the daughter of Arkady and Bella Shternshis, an engineer and medical doctor, respectively. They lost relatives in the Ukraine during the Holocaust.

Although anti-Semitism posed a problem for some Soviet Jews, Anna Shternshis experienced little of that animus, and it did not deter her.

"However, I do remember certain remarks which made me feel bad at certain moments of my life. And when I was in high school, a boy did not want to sit next to me because I was Jewish. Since he was not popular at all, it was nothing to worry about.

"The fact that my sister and I knew nothing about what the word 'Jew' means led to some funny situations. When I was six, I called her a 'Jew.' We thought it was a dirty word. I also thought one ate matzah on May Day."

Shternshis was introduced to Jewish culture, in a systematic way, in 1991, when the Russian State University of the Humanities and the Jewish Theological Seminary of New York launched Project Judaica.

"For the first time, Russian students were taught Yiddish, Jewish history, Hebrew and Jewish tradition, literature and culture in a Soviet state university. I really enjoyed the program, and after graduating, I decided to pursue my interests in Jewish studies."

Anna Shternshis

As part of Project Judaica, she studied at Hebrew University for a term.

Her parents were very supportive of her career plans, and were especially pleased by the fact that she was able to converse with them in Yiddish, just months after starting to study the language.

"They felt that my interest in Yiddish and in Jewish culture would have pleased their parents had they been alive."

Shternshis, whose parents still reside in Moscow, left Russia in 1996, bound for Oxford University on a scholarship.

There she studied Yiddish in the department of modern languages and literature. Her doctoral dissertation was on Jewish popular culture in the Soviet Union.

Then, as a post-doctoral fellow at the Center for Advanced Judaic Studies at the University of Pennsylvania, she studied the role of Yiddish songs in Soviet propaganda.

Last year, after teaching a course at the Oxford Institute for Yiddish Studies, she was hired by the University of Toronto.

Shternshis, who is married to music journalist Dan Rosenberg, is currently writing a book on Jewish identity in the Soviet Union from 1917 to 1941. The book's tentative title is Soviet and Kosher.

She has also embarked on an oral history project about Jewish daily life in early Soviet Russia. The transcribed interviews, in Yiddish and Russian, are stored at the Frankel Center for Judaic Studies at the University of Michigan.

During the summer, Shternshis was in Germany interviewing Soviet Jewish immigrants in Berlin.

Looking ahead, she plans to write a book on the daily lives of Jews in the Soviet Union from 1917 to 1953.

To the best of her knowledge, Russia today is home to about 500,000 Jews. "They have no trouble getting into universities, finding jobs or, for that matter, leaving the country."

Anti-Semitism in Russia is not as serious as it was during the Soviet and pre-Soviet eras, she said. But anti-Semitic posters can be seen all over the country and anti-Jewish newspapers are sold openly near Red Square in Moscow.

Queen's U student produces his first feature film

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Sponsé is quite literally going places, and it's likely the same can be said of the recently released film's 19-year-old director Aaron Szamosi, a Queen's University student who spent more than two years on the ambitious project.

The 96-minute teen comedy will be screened at AUSFEST, the Australian Digital and Video Film Festival this October in Brisbane. Closer to home, it premiered on June 9 at Thornhill's City Playhouse.

Szamosi, who organized the event to raise funds for Unicef, followed up earlier this month with a screening at the International Teen Movie Festival at AMC 30 in Concord, Ont.

This Sunday, Aug. 25, Sponsé will be shown at the Toronto Centre for the Performing Arts in a charity event called Suavity at 3 p.m. and 8 p.m. (also for Unicef).

Each show will also include a second, brief teen movie and performances by live bands, two of which (in the afternoon performances) were formed by Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto (CHAT) alumni. Tickets are available for $16 through Ticketmaster, $14 at the theatre box office, or online at www.silvertech.ca.

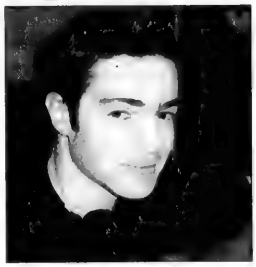
The name Sponsé, with its echoes of spontaneity and hint of sophistication, refers to a teen improv group with an unusual feature: the actors perform in the course of everyday life instead of on a stage. A romance, a sinister element and some comic relief are also woven into the film's plot.

"I came up with the word," said Szamosi, who is back home in Thornhill and working at a summer job as a software programmer before returning for his second year in Kingston. "[Sponsé] just sounded cool. I watch a lot of European movies."

He credits his Grade 10 English teacher, Tobi Bongard, with giving him the opportunity to direct school plays, and his Grade 11 drama teacher, Lori Cohen – both of CHAT – for teaching him about working with a team and learning how to react quickly in an improv situation.

"I wanted to make a movie about an improv team," he said, adding that roughly one-third of the film was ad-libbed.

Sponsé began when Szamosi was still at CHAT, before he went to Vaughan Secondary School to complete his high school studies. Although he brought together eight of his friends to work on a story concept, none of the seven lead actors were friends of his. His mother, grandfather, and an uncle all have brief appearances, however.



Aaron Szamosi

Among the seven leads are three local Jewish teens – David Attar, Jonathan Goldapple and Matt Zegman.

Szamosi handed out 400 fliers at 11 schools last year before auditioning 82 people. In all, about 50 "volunteer actors" took part in the film.

"Technically, this was a zero-budget film," he said.

Editing Sponsé on his computer took Szamosi eight months, working six hours at a stretch every three to four days, excluding exam time.

Szamosi – who started his own video company, Silver Tech, as a Grade 9 student and gained experience filming CHAT and UJA Federation Board of Jewish Education events – edited Sponsé on "just a regular PC" using digital video editing software.

In fact, until 45 minutes before the premiere, he was fine-tuning his work. Although he is "very satisfied" with the final product, Szamosi said he is also critical of things he could have done differently. "I'm a perfectionist."

His company also does recording work in a portable studio and, for Sponsé, he used original music by Canadian bands. Aside from individual projects, Szamosi said he is trying to co-ordinate efforts among directors and young Canadian artists to further Canada's entertainment industry.

At some point – he figures maybe in 15 years – Szamosi would like to write and produce a feature based on the life story of his paternal grandmother, a Holocaust survivor who began life anew in the Hungarian countryside and later in Canada.

"I want to give myself time to gain the proper expertise and knowledge to really give that topic its proper respect," he said.

In the meantime, the biology and film student and incoming Hillel vice-president has begun writing a drama, to be shot in 2004 and released in 2005.

U of T grad honoured for community work

By ADAM GRACHNIK
CJN Intern

Elana Weintraub, 21, has spent thousands of hours working in the Jewish community trying to help other people.

This year, Weintraub, a Yeshiva University student and University of Toronto graduate, is the winner of the Stephen Cooper Award, a financial award for young adults recognizing leadership and commitment to the Jewish community.

"I was honestly shocked. I didn't expect to get it," she said while sipping a chillatte at Second Cup. "It's a really special honour. I'm grateful to the Cooper family. The family is doing a really great thing [by] helping people realize their roots."

Weintraub was selected out of many candidates because, as Adi Neuberger, chair of the Stephen Cooper Award committee, said, "she had a long and consistent involvement with the Jewish community from a very young age.

"There's something very genuine about her," Neuberger said. "She's very enthusiastic, very warm and very confident."

Highlights of Weintraub's involvement include three years with the Jewish Students' Union (JSU) at U of T, an internship at Baycrest Hospital and a summer with Jewish Campus Services. As well, she has been a Grade 1 Hebrew teacher at Holy Blossom Religious School for five years.

"I have had positive experiences," Weintraub, who is fluent in Hebrew, said. "[Working in the community] was not thrown on me or put on me. It was an individual decision I made and I progressed in it. I realized quickly that this was for me."

After graduating from U of T with a degree in criminology, Weintraub came to a crossroads.

Realizing her love for Jewish life and social work, she applied to and was accepted by Yeshiva University's Wurzweiller School of Social Work in New York.

"It was a kind of a scary decision to make," said Weintraub, who graduated from Bialik Hebrew Day School and Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto (CHAT).

"While [we were] growing up, other girls wanted to dance. I wanted to be a cop. I always loved the inner working of the criminal mind. It was always intriguing."

For Wurzweiller's master's degree program, students take classes in New York for eight weeks each summer for three years and complete two internships in their field during the rest of the year, either inside or outside New York.

Because the school packs a full year of learning into only eight weeks, Weintraub said, "you either sink or swim, but you have to work really hard."

Weintraub's first placement brought her home to Toronto this year, where she worked full-time with Holocaust survivors in Baycrest Hospital's geriatrics department.

"The experience was great. I really grew up in one year," she said, admitting that she was "not being able to sleep the night before she met her first client."

Elana Weintraub

Now, she said, "when I walk into a room, it's almost a natural thing. It really hit me that my degree was the right one to enter. I really enjoy talking to people and being able to relate to individuals."

While at Baycrest, Weintraub continued teaching at Holy Blossom, because she "really likes young people."

She also volunteered at the Beth Shalom Synagogue's Out of the Cold Program, which provides shelter, food and clothing to homeless people.

When asked how she does so many things with her time, she quickly says that she has "a hard time relaxing."

During her undergraduate days at U of T, she was very involved with the JSU, holding the position of social chair and social action chair.

She admits at times it was difficult to get students out to events, but that she's "grateful to have had the experience and to [have] met a lot of people."

With her council, she organized a luncheon to raise money for the fight against breast cancer and frequently prepared sandwiches for the homeless.

After completing her internship next May, Weintraub will finish her final term in New York next summer and then graduate.

While she admits that "she loves New York," she said Toronto is where her family and friends are and where she plans to live when she graduates.

When asked about her future, she blushed and quickly said, "It scares me to plan the rest of my life."

But Weintraub seems secure in what she does. To other young Jewish people, she said, "It's important to make a connection [to Judaism], [but] do what you're interested in. Don't do it just for your resumé. Hopefully you'll grow to love it."

Victoria to get its first mikvah beside shul

By KITTY HOFFMAN
Special to The CJN

VICTORIA — It's taken almost 150 years, but this city's Jewish community will soon have a mikvah.

On July 22, a small group of delighted onlookers watched as concrete was poured, under strict rabbinical supervision, into what will become the first-ever ritual bath in British Columbia's capital.

The ceremony was part of the creation of the foundation and basement for a new facility being built beside Congregation Emanu-el's historic heritage-designated synagogue building. Long a dream of the congregation, this new social and education centre will cost more than $1 million and add classroom and social hall space for the growing shul.

With almost 250 member families, and almost 100 students in its Hebrew school, the congregation has been cramped in its one-room building, which has had to serve as a combined sanctuary, school and social hall. The new building will be built over the next few months and will provide some breathing space for its community's various activities.

Victoria's Jewish community was established during the gold rush of 1858, and the first Jewish organization in western Canada was its Benevolent Society, founded in 1859. The Jewish Cemetery, which is still used today, was consecrated in 1860, and the first meeting of a congregation took place in 1862.

Congregation Emanu-El is now the oldest synagogue in continuous use in Canada, and one of the oldest in North America. But despite these early provisions for burial, tzedakah and worship, no mikvah was ever built.

"It's remarkable to me that the community built a cemetery and a synagogue, and it's taken this long to build a mikvah," says Rabbi Harry Brechner, the congregation's current spiritual leader.

"One of the first needs of a community is a mikvah, and this will be the first mikvah on Vancouver Island."

Community established in 1858

The mikvah's design and the concrete-pouring ceremony were supervised by Rabbi Avraham Feigelstock of Vancouver.

Rabbi Brechner says that while he himself is a rabbinical "general practitioner," Rabbi Feigelstock is a specialist, and one of Canada's premier halachic experts, on mikvahs. "We wanted someone, hopefully local, that the whole community can feel has helped to build a halachic mikvah."

The mikvah has been a key component of Jewish life from earliest biblical times, and the remains of mikvah sites are found at most archaeological excavations of Jewish settlements.

From the beginning, the mikvah has been used for symbolic ritual purification, for the elevation of people and things to a higher spiritual level.

Rabbi Aryeh Kaplan, one of the great modern commentators on mystical practices in Judaism, called his book on mikvahs The Waters of Eden, referring to the teaching that the so-called "living waters" of the mikvah (the "mayim chaim") connect back to the River of Life that flowed out of the Garden of Eden.

In the days of the Temple in Jerusalem, the priests would ritually purify themselves before performing rites and sacrifices. As well, both men and women would immerse themselves in the mikvah at various times, including for Shabbat and holidays, a practice still followed in many observant communities.

Since the destruction of the Temple, regular use of the mikvah has focused on the laws of niddah, part of the laws of taharat hamish-pachah, or family purity, and Rabbi Brechner emphasizes that "the holiness and power that mikvah adds to intimacy is very important."

He adds that "the understanding of mikvah now is very different. Women now are reclaiming mikvah as a way of creating holiness in time and space together."

The presence of a mikvah in Victoria, he says, will "create a space, an opening for our community. When we have our own space, there will be the possibility to create all kinds of new rituals for spiritual cleansing."

Rabbi Brechner predicts that the community "will see a real blossoming of women who want to be involved."

He notes that there is also interest among men and women to use the mikvah "as a way of transitioning, of readying" for new phases in life.

These occasions may include preparation for a holiday or a personal simchah; renewal after the death of a loved one or other kinds of loss; immersion before a life transition such as starting a new job or after recovery from an illness.

Victoria's mikvah has been designed as a meditative, contemplative space. In keeping with the general ethos of life on Vancouver Island, it will be as natural a kind of setting as possible, replicating as closely as possible the environment of a natural spring, with many plants.

Fund-raising is in the final stretch to meet the project's budget. For further information, call 250-382-0615.

Jewish firefighter becomes department's spokesperson

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL – Many people describe what they do on the job as putting out fires, but when Richard Liebmann says that is what he does, he means it literally.

Liebmann has been a firefighter since 1993, and today is the head of public affairs for the new Montreal fire department, known officially as the Service de sécurité incendie. That means he's the chief spokesperson.

He acknowledges that it is not a traditional career for a Jew, especially one who grew up in Côte St. Luc and attended Jewish day schools and graduating from Bialik.

But Liebmann, 37, wouldn't have it any other way. He says the satisfaction of knowing you are helping people during a crisis, and sometimes saving their lives, is "extraordinarily gratifying."

Liebmann acknowledges that the image of the firefighters as heroes has been enhanced since the Sept. 11 attacks on the World Trade Center and the Pentagon.

"It is a matter of controlling risk to the extent you can," he says. "We have to assess the situation and stack the odds in our favour... But the bottom line is, we are the ones running in when everyone else is running out."

Sept. 11 has made governments realize that firefighters are "the first line of defence in a major incident, and the resources have to be there," he says.

Until Jan. 1, when the new City of Montreal was created, Liebmann served with the Côte St. Luc fire department, rising to the position of chief of emergency medical services (EMS), a rank just two rungs down from the top position of director.

Since the municipal merger, Liebmann has occupied the new position of chief of operations for the public affairs section. The new fire service combines the 22 departments that previously existed on the island.

> 'I realized the impact I could have on people's lives'

Montreal, which has 65 stations (66 including the seasonal station at the La Ronde amusement park), has the sixth largest fire department in North America after New York, Los Angeles, Chicago, Toronto and Houston, he says.

Liebmann reports directly to fire director Alain Michaud, with whom he is working to create a more efficient way of communicating with the media and the public.

For the first time, reporters have a single, direct line for information, which Liebmann answers personally during business hours. In addition, one of 12 specially trained, bilingual district chiefs is available at all times to speak to reporters. (The requirement for these chiefs to be "reasonably bilingual" is new.)

Liebmann's own French is close to pure laine, picked up while working alongside mainly francophone firefighters.

Liebmann, who works out of headquarters on Park Avenue, is on the scene at any significant incident, which means he may be out twice a day. He is engaged in actual firefighting only when necessary, but he hopes to return to fires someday.

Coming to the rescue in emergencies has fascinated him since he was a teen. He took a CPR course when he was 15 and was inspired by his instructor, an ambulance medical technician. By 16, he was volunteering with Côte St. Luc's EMS, which supplemented what was provided by various private ambulance companies, back in the days before the city-wide ambulance service Urgences Santé.

Liebmann says he knew what he wanted to do with his life after he saved a life while working as a volunteer with an ambulance company. His ambulance was called to a home where a baby had stopped breathing. Liebmann happened to be the first through the door and immediately applied CPR to the infant.

Richard Liebmann

That intervention was critical in saving the baby.

"At the Montreal Children's Hospital, the father burst into tears when he thanked me," he says. "I realized the impact I could have on people's lives."

At 18, Liebmann went to study to be a paramedic at the Medical College of Ohio for a year. But paramedics, who are qualified to start IVs and perform other invasive procedures en route to hospital, were not and still are not recognized in Quebec and therefore cannot practise there.

Frustrated, Liebmann went to McMaster University in Hamilton, Ont., where he obtained a B.Sc. in psychology and physiology instead.

Getting a degree fulfilled a vow he had made to his parents, who were very supportive of his career choice despite the Jewish community's "not holding public service in high esteem."

In Hamilton, he worked on a council that aimed to reduce road accidents, and in the summers for the Coast Guard at its inshore rescue stations.

Back in Montreal, he started a company that trained firefighters and others in rescue techniques. But he missed the hands-on action.

In 1993, he was hired by the Côte St. Luc fire department. Though he took a few courses in firefighting after he began working there, he says his first four years were on-the-job training.

His first fire while with Côte St. Luc was in a hair salon in the Cavendish Mall in the middle of the night that required breaking down the door and crawling on the floor under the smoke.

The only fire involving a Jewish institution was at the Castel Royal, a high-rise seniors' residence. Several floors had to be evacuated.

Liebmann does not recall many specific blazes, but says the more spectacular, multi-alarm fires were in older, often attached, buildings in Westmount and Outremont.

"Construction in Côte St. Luc is modern and sprinklers were mandatory, so there were few major fires," he says.

Though he was never seriously hurt, he once witnessed a colleague falling through a burning staircase, which shook him up.

The integration of EMS into the Côte St. Luc fire department a few years after he was hired was "a dream come true" for Liebmann, who had worked toward integration since he was 18.

As for the stories about firefighters being great cooks, that's an urban legend, says Liebmann. And there was no pole at the Côte St. Luc station – too many ankle injuries.

At home, Liebmann has two daughters, a six-year-old and a six-month-old. Of his older one, he says, "She has her own little firefighter's costume and is always asking if she can come to work with me. It's a great feeling when your child wants to be like you."

North American aliyah up in '02 despite conflict

By DAVID LAZARUS
Staff Reporter

Given the number of suicide bombings in Israel since the start of the latest intifadah, few would likely guess that the number of olim from North America is actually up so far this year.

Yet it is, said Benzi Sella, who this month is leaving Montreal after a four-year term as aliyah shaliach (emissary) at the Canadian Zionist Federation's Israel Aliyah Centre.

From January through July, Canada sent 79 olim to Israel, three more than during the same period last year.

That number might seem negligible, but Sella thinks that given "the situation" in Israel, any increase at all is significant.

The U.S. numbers are even better, he said. Aliyah from there jumped 54 per cent over the same period, from 544 to 836.

The good news from North America came as Israel's Central Bureau of Statistics said last week that overall immigration fell by 27 per cent in the first six months of 2002 compared to the same period last year. About 15,000 immigrants arrived between January and June, compared to 20,500 last year.

Sella attributes the rise in Canada and the United States to the increase in the number of North American Zionist organizations that have put aliyah promotion at the top of their agendas.

These groups include Nefesh B'Nefesh (Jewish Souls United), which gives cash to North Americans who want to make aliyah, and Aloh Na'aleh, a group launched five months ago by Orthodox rabbis to encourage American Orthodox Jews to make aliyah.

Sella says these groups and others, are part of a remarkable phenomenon.

"People should remember that our aliyah office here is focused more on doing the actual work involved in preparing for aliyah. I work on the specific needs of individuals. These other groups promote the idea, the spirit of aliyah."

One of the best indicators of aliyah for the future, Sella said, is in the number of people who open files at the aliyah desk, regardless of their final decision.

Those numbers are also on the rise so far this year. Canada had one more inquiry during the first seven months of 2002 compared to the same period last year (73 versus 72), but the United States saw a 45 per cent increase – from 417 to 607. The overall increase for North American file openings was 39 per cent.

This summer has seen quite an increase in interest. There were 143 files opened in July alone, nearly double the 75 files opened in July 2001.

All in all, things are beginning to look up on the aliyah front, Sella said.

However, numbers continue to be down for the various trips and programs the aliyah office supports with groups like the Israel Experience Centre and Hillel.

In the case of Jewish high school trips, university study programs, Birthright Israel and other student summer programs, lower participation numbers and outright cancellations reflect the worries of parents who don't want to see their kids in harm's way, Sella said.

Yet, he said, there hasn't been a parallel drop in Europe, where Birthright Israel numbers have been on the rise.

"It's completely different there," Sella said. "I think young Jews in countries like France and Argentina get more support from their parents and from their communities than they do here."

That being said, Sella said there has been some renewed interest in Israel Aliyah Centre-related trips to Israel since the launch earlier this year of If Not Now – When, the Jewish Agency's volunteer-recruitment campaign.

It promotes involvement with groups such as Sar-el (with the Israel Defence Forces), Magen David Adom, kibbutzim, community service and the civil guards.

The aliyah office also continues to promote a range of short-term travel/study and programs for prospective olim.

Sella said he felt fulfilled by his four years in Montreal, which have given him great affection for a devoted Jewish community.

His son Matan, now 3½, was also born here. "The first Canadian in the family," Sella joked.

When he returns home with his wife, Grace, a teacher, and his eldest son Yossi, 4½, Sella will continue to work for the Jewish Agency.

Sella's successor, Anat Uzan, was due to arrive in Montreal this month.

It's a very good community to come to, Sella said.

"I saw how the people here react in a crisis," he said. "The people here have a strong, strong feeling for Israel. They are highly-motivated and active."

A mea culpa that wasn't

According to Reports

By PAUL MICHAELS

Following the release of UN Secretary General Kofi Annan's report exonerating Israel of the charges of a "massacre" in a Jenin refugee camp in April, the Toronto Star's Rosie DiManno examined how a number of journalists – especially European writers – got it wrong.

These journalists uncritically believed the Palestinian claim of a massacre of hundreds of civilians and allegations of an assortment of war crimes. As we later learned in Annan's report, 52 Palestinians – the overwhelming majority combatants – died during days of intense fighting, along with 23 Israeli soldiers who fought door-to-door in order to avoid civilian casualties.

"But the reportage was severely flawed, probably because many reporters were (subconsciously or deliberately) prepared to accept the worst of Israel's military," writes DiManno ("Rush to Jenin judgment backfires," Aug. 9).

One the most flagrant illustrations was written by Phil Reeves of Britain's Independent newspaper. He compared Israel's operation in Jenin with Pol Pot's "killing fields" slaughter of one to three million Cambodians in the mid-1970s. The BBC and the Guardian weren't far behind in anti-Israel hysteria.

On Aug. 3, the day of Annan's report, Reeves filed what appeared to be a mea culpa, titled "Even journalists have to admit they're wrong sometimes." However, it soon became evident that Reeves was anything but chastened. He admitted to getting some facts wrong: "Contrary to popular belief, most journalists dislike getting it wrong and prefer to set the record straight."

But for the remainder of his piece, he basically blamed Israel for making him so "appalled and furious" that he bought into the massacre myth. He then goes on to fault the "pro-Israel lobby" for condemning journalists for an anti-Israel bias!

DiManno refers only obliquely to Reeves (politely refraining from naming him) and exposes his "non-apology 'apology'" for the sophistry that it is.

The Jenin massacre myth leads DiManno to an important question: "The media tends to sympathize with the victims, and in the Mideast conflict, circa 2002, the Palestinians are the victims-du-jour, no matter how many innocent Israelis are blown up. Why this is so, even as Hamas and other brutal organizations continue to send out suicide bombers to murder university students and children on public buses, I cannot explain."

But DiManno does try to explain this double standard and the general anti-Israel atmosphere that pervades some media circles. Pointing to anti-Semitic motivation, DiManno notes that "there is a deplorable anti-Semitic subtext in much of what is being written right now about Israel and the Palestinians." Charles Krauthammer pointed this out more than a decade ago in his now-classic piece, "Judging Israel" (Time, Feb. 26, 1990).

Phil Reeves and others in the British media and intellectual elite who have made their careers obsessing about alleged Israeli wrongdoing leave scant room for any other conclusion.

Paul Michaels is the director of communications for the Canada-Israel Committee.

Israel, PA hammer out 'Gaza First' pullback plan

By ALUF BENN
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — The "Gaza First" security plan, based on the principle of an Israeli withdrawal from the Gaza Strip and Bethlehem in exchange for a Palestinian crackdown on militants, was set to begin with an army pullout from Bethlehem possibly as early as Monday evening, if the Palestinian Authority (PA) took measures to maintain quiet in the area.

As PA officials prepared to meet with heads of other Palestinian organizations in Bethlehem Monday, a 13-year-old Palestinian youth was killed by Israeli army tank fire in the village of Burkin near the West Bank city of Jenin. Also Monday, Israel Defence Forces (IDF) troops and Palestinians exchanged gunfire in Nablus.

The Palestinian officials meeting in Bethlehem were expected to try to find a way to reduce violence and prevent terror.

But Palestinian militant groups including Hamas, Islamic Jihad and the Popular Front for the Liberation of Palestine said they rejected even a limited cessation of their 22-month-old uprising against Israeli occupation and would continue to mount attacks.

"The resistance will find ways to pursue the fight without clashing with the Palestinian Authority," senior Hamas official Abdel-Aziz al-Rantissi told Reuters. "Our rifles will remain directed against the Zionist enemy and only against the Zionist enemy."

Islamic Jihad leader Abdallah al-Shami called the move a "political gamble". Both groups have led a campaign of suicide bombings which have killed scores of Israelis in the uprising.

The Gaza First agreement, reached at a Sunday night meeting between Israeli Defence Minister Benjamin Ben-Eliezer and PA Interior Minister Abdel Razeq Yihiye in Tel Aviv, determines that in the first stage of the plan the Palestinians will begin assuming security responsibility and Israel will ease restrictions on the Palestinian civilian population.

Quoting an unnamed PA security official, the radio said the IDF would pull out of central Bethlehem late Monday, and would take down a number of roadblocks in Gaza, easing travel between various areas of the strip.

"This is the last opportunity granted people who presume to lead the Palestinian people, whether it be Interior Minister Yihiye or Dahlan," Deputy Defence Weizman Shiri said Monday.

According to a Defence Ministry statement, the troops will gradually pull back from parts of the territories under Palestinian control (Area A), beginning with the Gaza Strip and Bethlehem in the West Bank.

"Both sides agree to start implementing the initiative [Monday] in Gaza and Bethlehem," the statement said, but it added that the withdrawal is contingent on the Palestinians taking "responsibility to calm the security situation and reduce violence."

"The defence minister agreed that Israel for its part would do everything in order to ease conditions on the Palestinian population especially for civilians and in the humanitarian area at this time," the statement read.

The Palestinians were demanding that Israel withdraw troops to positions held in September 2000, at the outbreak of the latest violence. They also demanded the plan be implemented simultaneously in Gaza and the West Bank.

The talks, which were originally held on ministerial and operative levels, broke down two weeks ago after the Palestinians accused Israel of reneging on proposals put forward by Ben-Eliezer.

Army Radio quoted Hamas as calling the plan "an attempt to silence the Palestinian street in advance of an American operation in Iraq."

Muslims draft 'hit list' of 15 Danish Jews, paper says

By YAIR SHELEG
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

COPENHAGEN — Muslim extremists in Denmark have prepared a "hit list" of 15 prominent Jewish leaders in that country, the Danish newspaper Jyllands-Posten reported last week.

The names of the targeted Jews were not published, due to pressure from the Danish police. However, Ha'aretz has learned the list includes a former chief rabbi of Denmark, Binyamin Melchior, father of Israel's deputy foreign minister, Rabbi Michael Melchior.

The Danish paper reported that the "hit list" specifies cash prizes for anyone who kills someone on the list.

The paper based its report on sources in Denmark's Muslim community. It said it did not know who was responsible for drafting the list, but suspicion centres on Hizb ut Tahrir (Liberation Party), an extremist organization that has expressed support in the past for killing Jews. Due to these statements, the Danish Justice Ministry is currently considering outlawing the organization.

The head of the Danish Jewish community, Prof. Jacques Blum, told the paper that the hit list shows that "the intifadah has reached Denmark. I view it as very grave that Jews cannot walk about freely on the streets of Denmark."

Binyamin Melchior, who was chief rabbi of Denmark from 1969-96, told Ha'aretz that he does not know whether his name appears on the list.

He said that police representatives "spoke with various people in the community, I among them. They didn't tell me I had been personally threatened. They only told me not to be afraid, they are taking care of the situation... They said they are keeping watch over places where they fear something might happen, but I don't know whether they are watching my house."

"There is no need for any Israeli pressure on the matter, since the Danish authorities are taking the necessary steps themselves," he added.

The elder Rabbi Melchior, who recently started an association for interfaith dialogue in Denmark, said the reported hit list is no indication of the general state of Jewish-Muslim relations in Denmark.

He was to meet Monday with the heads of the interfaith association to discuss the report.

Birthright trips offer Israelis hope: Melchior

By focusing on our youth, the terrorists have tried to take away our future, as well as create a wedge between Israel and the Jewish people, Rabbi Melchior said.

But this is a time when it is especially important for young people to connect to their heritage because issues about Israel and the Jewish people have become complex and many students are feeling embarrassed about their Jewishness, Rabbi Melchior added.

Now in its third year, Birthright Israel was originally launched as a three-way partnership between the State of Israel, philanthropists Charles Bronfman and Michael Steinhardt, and Diaspora community organizations. The program offers a free trip to Israel for young adults age 18 to 26, in order to strengthen ties between Jews around the world. Since its creation, 30,000 participants have been to Israel from 25 different countries, and $50 million (US) has been directed into the Israeli economy.

This year has seen an increase in numbers over last year, Rabbi Melchior said. However, the increase has come from countries outside of North America – such as Morocco, Bulgaria, Hungary and Greece.

"Security concerns seems to have had a bigger effect on North American parents," Rabbi Melchior noted, "which may be due to the emotional impact of Sept. 11."

Whatever the causes, he hopes registration from the United States and Canada will recover this year.

Birthright "has become a flagship of the connection between the Jewish people around the world and Israel," with benefits flowing in both directions, he said.

Israelis have a great deal to learn from the Diaspora about pluralism and the acceptance of many different identities. The program often offers Israelis their first opportunity to meet Jewish kids from the Diaspora and encounter liberal Judaism.

In addition, the mifgashim (gatherings) at the end of each trip allow for important relationships to develop, Rabbi Melchior said, noting that Canadians have become known for their significant positive contribution the event – they are often the loudest group there.

Canada urged to align Iraqi policy with that of U.S.

The Jewish leaders applauded a recent shift in Canada's voting posture at the United Nations, in which the Canadian delegation abstained on resolutions that attacked Israel in strong language. That marks an improvement over the situation two years ago, when Canada supported resolutions that singled out Israel for blame in the Palestinian intifadah. However, abstentions "are not good enough for us," and the minister was urged to oppose resolutions that blame Israel or advocate a "moral equivalency" between acts of terror and Israeli steps to combat it, Wilder said.

"Words count... and Canada has to be more sensitive to their impact on international debate – including the licence they give to those hostile to Israel and the Jewish people to delegitimize and demonize Jews with the 'imprimatur' of the United Nations," said meeting participant Shoel Silver, president-elect of the United Israel Appeal Federations of Canada (UIAFC).

The delegation also complained about Canadian officials working for UNRWA, the UN agency operating in Palestinian refugee camps. Instead of being neutral in the conflict, they are coming down squarely in support of the Palestinian position, "which is utterly preposterous," Wilder said.

The situation in Iraq was also discussed, and the minster was urged to align Canadian policy more closely to that of the United States. "It's preposterous to give [Saddam Hussein] another chance. The game is over as far as we're concerned. That man has to be dealt with," Wilder said.

Canadian Jewish Congress President Keith Landy, who also attended the meeting, said the minister "is of the view that [Iraq] is a tinderbox, and he does not feel Canada should throw a match into it.

"We certainly wanted Canada to recognize the danger that the regime in Iraq presented," he said.

Landy said Jewish community organizations are closer in their views "than I've seen in a long time. I think it's a general view that the community is feeling itself under pressure in the last while."

In addition to the CIC, Congress and UIAFC, B'nai Brith Canada and the Canadian Zionist Federation were also represented at the meeting.

Report: Abu Nidal found dead in apparent suicide

By YOSSI MELMAN
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — The body of Palestinian militant commander Abu Nidal was found in a Baghdad apartment, Israel Radio quoted the Palestinian daily Al Ayyam as reporting Monday.

According to the paper, Abu Nidal suffered from a serious disease, and gunshot wounds indicated that he had committed suicide while alone in the apartment three days earlier.

There had been reports of Abu Nidal's deteriorating health in the Arab and international media four years ago, which claimed that he had been hospitalized in Cairo under prison conditions. A decade earlier, reports were published and confirmed by intelligence agencies that he underwent treatment in an East German Hospital after being diagnosed with leukemia.

Abu Nidal, 65, whose real name is Sabri Al Banna, broke off from the Palestine Liberation Organization (PLO) in 1974, claiming that the PLO was too moderate. He is said to have been responsible for 90 terrorist attacks and the deaths of hundreds of people, including senior PLO officials.

Abu Nidal

The Abu Nidal organization is suspected of having carried out terrorist attacks in 20 countries. Targets included the United States, the United Kingdom, France, Israel, moderate Palestinians, the PLO, and various Arab countries.

His organization attempted to assassinate Israel's ambassador to Britain, Shlomo Argov, in June 1982. The attack on Argov, which left him seriously injured, triggered then-defence minister Ariel Sharon's invasion of Lebanon, which aimed to repel Palestinian forces controlled by Yasser Arafat.

Abu Nidal's group had broken from Arafat's Fatah organization years before and had even plotted attempts on Arafat's life.

Abu Nidal is said to have lived at various times in Iraq, Syria, Algeria, Libya and Sudan.

Abu Nidal was tried in absentia by a Fatah military court and condemned to death. Beside terrorist operations against Jewish targets in various countries, the bulk of Abu Nidal's actions have been against the mainstream Fatah group. He is responsible for killing 16 of Arafat's men.

The Week in Israel

August 12

• Members of leading Palestinian groups meeting in Gaza City rejected the idea of ending attacks on civilians inside Israel and instead backed a continuation of their uprising. (Tuesday, the Fatah movement of the PLO said it would "focus its struggle in the West Bank and Gaza.")

• The death toll in the Hebrew University terrorist bombing rose to nine. Revital Barashi, 30, died of head wounds sustained in the attack.

August 13

• Iraq is the greatest threat facing Israel, Prime Minister Ariel Sharon told the Knesset foreign affairs and defense committee. (Later in the week it was reported that Sharon had sent messages to the U.S. administration saying that postponing the Iraq operation "will not create a more convenient environment for action in the future.")

August 14

• Israel has decided to provide its citizens with an antidote against radiation from nuclear fallout. Defence officials decided to include iodine capsules in gas mask kits distributed to the public.

August 15

• Sharon announced he will attend a Los Angeles vigil on the one-year anniversary of the Sept. 11 attacks. Sharon's plans do not include a visit to Washington.

• Haim Tzadok, one of the founders of Israel's legal system and of the Labor party, died at the age of 89.

August 16

• In an operation in the Hebron area, the IDF arrested Sudki Zaro, the Palestinian sniper who is believed to behind the killing 18 months ago of a 10-month-old baby, Shalhevet Pass.

Prague's Jews ask for help after floods

By MAGNUS BENNETT
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

PRAGUE — Jewish leaders in Prague have launched an international appeal for aid after floods caused an estimated $4 million in damage to Jewish holy sites.

On Sunday, President Vaclav Havel visited several historical Jewish sites that were damaged last week during the Czech Republic's worst floods in more than a century. Havel expressed sympathy for the Jewish community while touring the 13th-century Old-New Synagogue and the Pinkas Synagogue.

Both sites took in several feet of water, and experts are still examining the extent of the damage.

A spokesperson said Havel has informed Israeli President Moshe Katsav and Czech-born, former U.S. secretary of state Madeleine Albright about the damage and hopes they will be able to help.

Volunteers worked around the clock last week sandbagging synagogues and other Jewish sites in a desperate attempt to keep the waters away.

While giant steel barriers on the banks of the Vltava River prevented flooding over land, water seeped through underground channels into the city's historic Jewish Quarter.

Jewish officials discovered Aug. 14 that the Old-New Synagogue had taken in four feet of water, covering pews and damaging the building.

The Pinkas Synagogue was also hit, with water levels inside the building reaching nearly seven feet and damaging some of the 80,000 handwritten inscriptions of the names of Czech Holocaust victims.

Jewish officials, who had moved all Jewish artifacts including Torah scrolls from the sites before the flood waters hit, were shocked by the damage.

"There has been serious damage to some of Prague's Jewish treasures," said Tomas Jelinek, the chair of the city's Jewish community. But "in a sense, we are grateful because the damage could have been much worse if the river Vltava's banks had burst."

The Jewish Museum also was badly hit by underground flooding from the city's sewers.

Officials succeeded in moving precious Jewish artifacts, including Torah shields, pointers, manuscripts and rare books to higher levels before the floods, but the building is likely to be without electricity for up to four weeks after the generator was submerged in water. The museum's air-conditioning system also has been knocked out, threatening damage to rare manuscripts and books.

"This is a very serious blow," said Leo Pavlat, the museum director. "It is hard to see seven years of work in building up the museum be affected so quickly."

The disaster could not have come at a worse time for museum officials, who have had to cancel several exhibitions across the Jewish Quarter at the peak of the tourist season. It faces losses amounting to thousands of dollars in ticket sales.

"We are suffering huge losses because August is the best month of the year for us," Pavlat said. "We are not subsidized by the state and rely on entry fees to fund our activities."

Pavlat warned that a plan to reconstruct the former Smichov Synagogue in Prague, to house archives and precious objects, now was threatened.

Czech soldiers and volunteers try to stop the mounting water of the Vltava River in Prague.
[RNS/Reuters photo]

"We are going to have to look at our budget," he said. "We had wanted to start on the Smichov project at the beginning of the new year, but I'm afraid that may not now be possible."

In Germany, the flooding that left much of Dresden under water also damaged the cellar of the city's new synagogue, according to a spokesperson for the Central Council of Jews in Germany.

However, the sanctuary remained dry and Torah scrolls had been secured.

Roman Koenig, president of the Dresden Jewish community, reported via the Berlin-based Central Council on Aug. 16 that representatives were checking daily on all elderly and disabled members of the community. However, lack of telephone and e-mail contact made it difficult to determine their status.

The Jewish community in Dresden has slightly more than 1,000 members.

Venues normally protected by alarm systems were under increased police guard, the council spokesperson said.

Jewish community officials in Prague have set up a bank account for donations in U.S. dollars. The use of funds will be publicly reported and audited, they said.

The account, number 179139212/0300 in the name of the Prague Jewish Community, known in Czech as Zidovska obec v Praze, is at the CSOB Bank in Prague 7. The SWIFT number for transfers is CEKOCZPP.

Nurse Fran Wolfe has been hired by North York General Hospital as its emergency room geriatric case manager in response to the increased number of seniors in its emergency department since the closing of Branson Hospital.

The catchment area of North York General Hospital has the highest percentage of seniors in Toronto, a number which is increasing, said Tim Rutledge, emergency services medical program director.

As well, hospital statistics show that since Branson Hospital switched from a regular hospital to a community care centre, the percentage of seniors at the Leslie site emergency department has gone from 21 per cent of emergency room patients in the summer of 2000 to 25 per cent this past May.

Wolfe trained as a general nurse at North York General, specialized in geriatrics and is currently completing a course to become a nurse practitioner. She assumed her position in September 2001; she now sees an average of 100 patients a month.

Wolfe said her clientele are people over 70, particularly those who have had a fall; those with declining cognition, recognized either because of a poor memory or by the triage nurse upon admission; or those living alone, with few or no community supports.

The effects of illnesses in the aged can escalate quickly, she said. For instance, a urinary tract infection can lead to a person "feeling funny," then acting strangely, developing poor short-term memory, and possibly taking the wrong medication.

Fran Wolfe

Similarly, a fall, which in a younger person may be relatively innocuous, can cause a rapid decline in the well-being of an elderly person.

Prescription medications, even when taken properly, can be a source of difficulty as well, Wolfe said. The elderly may be on many different medications whose interaction may lead to poor memory, disorientation, restlessness or delirium. Some medications cause constipation.

Wolfe said she sometimes goes to patients' homes to find containers of medication or over-the-counter or alternative drugs that may be interfering with what the doctor has prescribed. She may recommend the pharmacist send in only one week's supply at a time.

These visits may also highlight other safety needs, such as shower bars, stabalized rugs or emergency call buttons.

Clients are referred to Wolfe by hospital staff and physicians or they hear about her through word-of-mouth, she said.

When Wolfe is called to see a patient, she notes what nursing, x-rays and tests have been done, how alert he or she is, his or her appearance and what changes the patient or caregiver reports has taken place recently. She checks for depression, memory loss and substance abuse.

"It's like putting together the pieces of a puzzle," she said.

Wolfe considers her position as being an advocate for the elderly. Many don't know how to access the services they need and are frightened and overwhelmed at the prospect of losing their independence, or at having to move into an institution. Wolfe not only helps them to navigate the health care system, but provides them with emotional and psychological support.

The hospital's seniors health centre operates clinics as part of the Ministry of Health's Regional Geriatric Program, which offers such services as a day hospital and foot care, and will send consultants to a patient's home to check on concerns voiced at the hospital or by Wolfe.

Wolfe said she follows patients through their emergency room stay, makes sure they are either settled in a hospital room or helped to get home safely, and that all necessary paperwork is done and necessary precautions are in place. She provides whatever services are necessary, from meals on wheels and shopping to home care and house cleaning.

While the work is challenging, Wolfe enjoys it.

"Seniors are valuable people," she said. "It's a misnomer to call them 'elderly,' implying that they have lost their worth."

Israeli artists invigorate Frame of Mind Gallery

By MIRIAM CHINSKY

TORONTO — Calman Shemi's paintings at Frame of Mind Gallery on the west side of Avenue Road south of Wilson sing with colour.

David Schluss, also at Frame of Mind, has created a distinctive personal style. Ignoring brush and spatula, he paints entirely with his hands.

"Using the palm of my hand I can get a play of light that I could never achieve with a brush," he says. "I start with the abstract and figures emerge."

A sculptor as well, he currently fashions bronze figures, whirling, dancing, embracing – virtually pulsing with life – which evolve from his extraordinary painting technique.

Gallery owner Ezra Ballas, originally from Ramat Gan, Israel, notes proudly that artists with strong ties to Israel comprise some 30 per cent of his comprehensive inventory. Shemi and Schluss attract an enthusiastic following.

David's Harp, bronze sculpture "pulsating with life."

Shemi, born in 1939 in Argentina, immigrated to Israel in 1961 and was a member of Kibbutz Carmia for 20 years, working in agriculture and sculpting in wood and clay. Over time he explored soft painting, developed serigraphs and created with acrylics. A recent departure sees him "reinventing" a lacquer technique reminiscent of ancient China and Japan. He paints on a wood or lacquer panel that has been covered in layers of gold and/or silver leaf. Between each layer, the surface is hand-polished to a fine finish revealing a remarkable lustre. The artist enhances each work by building a shadow box for depth – his Wood and Windows approach. Just this year, he has added new beauty by hand-carving and lacquering frames attuned to each painting.

Shemi's solo exhibitions have appeared in several countries, including Israel, France, Australia, Canada, the United States, Spain and Nigeria. He also shows at the Spertus Museum of Judaica, the Fashion Institute in Chicago and Citibank New York.

David Schluss, born 1945 in Israel, attended school in Jaffa and was deeply affected by its mystic walls and its historic places of worship. Lacking funds for adequate painting materials, he sketched in charcoal and cheap pencil, giving these studies to anyone who cared.

In his early 20s, Schluss migrated with his family to Montreal and in 1969, enrolled in the prestigious École des Beaux Arts, began teaching privately and went on to complete a fine arts degree at Sir George Williams University (now Concordia University).

Embrace. "Starting with the abstract."

Experimenting through the years, he arrived at his hands-on whimsy and joy method.

In 1983, Schluss opened a studio in Fort Lauderdale, Fla., but he travels frequently to Tel Aviv. His paintings are on view at Israel's Teffen Museum, at Fort Lauderdale's Museum of Modern Art and in private and public collections throughout the world.

At his Frame of Mind Gallery, Ezra Ballas knows what paintings, prints and sculptures appeal, selecting quality works and offering a bright oasis in the neighbourhood location, 2074½ Avenue Rd. where he has been situated for 22 years.

We challenge. We care. She succeeds.

Branksome Hall, an independent school for girls in the heart of the city, offers a complete university preparatory programme for Junior Kindergarten to Graduating Year. A non-denominational school with a strong emphasis on community involvement, student leadership and participation, Branksome has a long tradition of care and commitment to each girl who attends. Over 80 clubs and teams, a beautifully treed 12 acre campus and the full integration of information technology enrich the life of its students. Small class sizes and a strong faculty support the students at all grade levels. An Extended French programme is available from Grade 6 on and Residential programme from Grade 9.

This coming academic year marks the 100th birthday of the school. Since 1903 the school has valued the development of the well-rounded and socially responsible scholar. Now, as it enters its second century, those same values will propel the school forward toward the full implementation of the International Baccalaureate programme. Though Branksome anticipates joining over 1000 schools worldwide, it will be the first all girls' school in the world to offer the entire IB experience.

Entry years are: Junior Kindergarten; Grade 1; Grade 7 and Grade 9. Admission enquires for September 2003 are now welcome. Branksome's Open House is on Wednesday, November 13, 2002. For further information, please contact the Admissions Office at 416-920-6265, ext. 268.

Give Your Child An Educational Advantage

As a result of the changes in the Ontario curriculum, students now face new challenges and more pressure to succeed than ever before. Math Masters provides a wide range of services to help their students meet these demands and achieve their academic goals.

The Math Masters student understands that the learning process is not a universal approach. The student is an individual, and each individual must apply the most effective and efficient means to reach his or her goal of academic excellence.

Personalized and self-paced learning programs cater to the needs and diverse learning styles of each individual Math Masters student. Whether the student is enrolled in one-to-one tutoring, a credit course, or a support/enrichment program, the instructor will challenge and motivate the student to attain academic success.

Math Masters programs emphasize effective study skills, time management, organizational skills, motivational techniques, and memory training. The Math Masters student will experience an improvement in grades, long-term memory, confidence and self-esteem.

Kindergarten & Child Care Combined

Upper Canada Child Care Centres is a growing family of 29 child care facilities throughout York Region and North York. In addition to operating quality, non-profit care for children ages 3 months to 12 years, five of our centres also offer specialized programs which combine junior and senior kindergarten education with a full day child care component. These kindergarten programs run five days per week for the full year. The Curriculum emphasizes language, mathematics, science and technology, personal and social development and the arts.

Educators facilitate the child's growth by providing a rich and stimulating program. Balanced to provide learning opportunities in all educational areas, our program offers carefully planned and monitored learning centres. These concrete experiences promote competency and encourage self esteem.

Some of the many advantages to this program include: low child:adult ratios, no need for bussing from school to daycare, daily contact with teachers and no alternate day schedules.

Extended hours, nutritious lunches and snacks are provided at no extra charge. Please see our ad for the Upper Canada Kindergarten Program nearest you. For more information on any Upper Canada program, please call our Head Office at 905-946-1113.

Test Prep, Admissions and Guidance. For life.

Heading to a US university?

At Kaplan, we understand how complex the college admissions process can be, especially a test like the SAT. Why write the SAT? First, it is used as a common yardstick against which to measure different students from different schools with different curricula. Secondly, the SAT is used for its predictive value. When evaluated in conjunction with high school grades, the SAT allowed admissions committees at American universities to make a reasonable prediction of how a prospective student will perform academically in their first year.

The SAT is not a perfect test - it certainly favours those who prepare versus those who do not. The SAT lends itself to preparation because it is a predictable test concentrating on a set of specific reasoning skills that can be learned. This kind of bias is evident on all examinations. Better prepared students score higher. The SAT does give colleges a quantifiable measure with which to consider candidates.

Do you know a leader in informal Jewish education?

Brandeis University's IJE Seminar in Professional Leadership offers a groundbreaking opportunity to transform educational visions into advanced skills and solid achievement. The fully-subsidized seminar offers:

- Cutting-edge thinking in Jewish youth education
- Individualized professional development
- Guidance and support for work with a mentor
- Participation in a network of leading professionals

The seminar consists of three four-day sessions over 13 months, beginning in March 2003. Participants will work with and learn from university faculty, outstanding practitioners and a diverse group of colleagues. We are looking for educators who want to be change agents in their organizations and communities.

Outreach at York

The York School has a strong history of OUTREACH, both in the local community and beyond. For the past three years, York has participated in Ooch-a-Thon, a fund raising effort which supports Camp Oochigeas, a summer programme on Lake Rosseau for children undergoing active treatment for cancer as well as those in remission. This year, The York School donated $36,000 to the camp and this amount represents the largest single donation from a school in the history of the camp, exceeding last year's total by $10,000 and providing a two-week camping experience for 24 youngsters. Over the past three years, York has raised over $75,000 for the camp and has sent more than 50 young cancer patients away for an incredible outdoor experience.

For many years, York has been active with a Montreal-based agency called "Friends for Families" which operates orphanages in Bangladesh and in India.

This past March Break, seven students from York participated in a new venture called "Jamaican Self-Help" and spent two weeks, with one of their teachers, in a variety of settings in Kingston. York students were placed at a children's home, an elementary school, and a health clinic in one of Kingston's shantytowns.

The Academy For Gifted Children – P.A.C.E.

The Academy for Gifted Children - P.A.C.E. is the only private school in Ontario devoted entirely to intellectually gifted students. The primary goal of P.A.C.E. is to find and enhance the abilities of each child in order to maximize his or her potential for success, while addressing the social and emotional needs of each student. Barbara Rosenberg, Director of P.A.C.E, is a specialist in gifted education. P.A.C.E is based on the premise that gifted children need high-powered learning experiences to challenge their minds and ensure intellectual growth and achievement. P.A.C.E. offers programs from Grade 1 through University Entrance. In addition to the basic skills, P.A.C.E. offers a differentiated education, a curriculum that is built on greater depth and breadth of instruction, and a more complex approach to learning. A fully balanced program, including the fine arts and physical education, complements this specialized academic program. Please call the school for registration information: 905-773-0997.

Holiday Food Ideas

Look forward to the future

Rosh Hashanah is a joyous time when we gather our family and friends around the dinner table and revel in being together.

It is also a bittersweet time in which we remember those who are no longer with us, but whose customs and traditions often grace our holiday table.

Although customs differ slightly around the world, the holiday season is, for all of us, a time of introspection – to take stock of how we have lived our lives over the past year and to look forward to the future.

No matter where we are from, however, and no matter whose customs we follow, the holiday meal plays a central role in our celebrations.

For some, there are traditional Rosh Hashanah dishes that are reserved for that holiday. They are always prepared lovingly only once a year, and are anticipated with eagerness.

Some of these dishes are labour intensive and difficult to prepare without an actual demonstration. We have tried to give you a "taste" of a few of them.

For others, Rosh Hashanah is a time to experiment – to try new recipes or to put a new twist on a traditional meal.

In the upcoming weeks, we will attempt to give you both a flavour of the past and some ideas for your holiday meals.

Whether you are preparing to cook your first Rosh Hashanah meal or you are considering handing over the tradition to your children or grandchildren, we wish you a lot of good cooking and a lot of happy eating.

From all of us at The CJN, we wish you shanah tovah.

Rosh Hashanah evokes savoury memories

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

Four women reminisce about their families' High Holy Day traditions.

Sarah Taieb-Carlen, author and sociology lecturer at York University, says that 22 years after leaving her native Tunisia, she can still smell her mother and grandmother's pkalla, a traditional Tunisian Rosh Hashanah dish.

"They combined an enormous bunch of spinach with slivers of garlic and onion and cooked it in olive oil," she says.

"They would then add cilantro or coriander, dill, mint, parsley and finely cut celery. When that mixture was cooked, they would add beef or chicken, and then cooked beans."

She says the recipe is extremely difficult to prepare, but adds that "the dish was so fragrant, we could smell it to Haifa."

On erev Rosh Hashanah, she says, the family would dress in new clothes, and make Kiddush with boukha, "a delicious fig alcohol that I have yet to find here. For Hamotzi, we had homemade challah with sugar and honey."

In Tunisia – and in most Sephardi countries – the Rosh Hashanah meal began with a mini-seder, says Taieb-Carlen. (See related story by Rivka Tal on page 43.)

"We would pass offerings such as a sesame mix, leek and swiss chard from person to person, and on the second night, we added a fruit that we hadn't yet eaten on the holiday, such as pomegranate or fresh fig."

Spicy food was avoided throughout the holiday, she says, and sweet foods such as marzipan cigars, fried and dipped in honey, were reserved for dessert. "I still crave the manicotti – thin strips of dough shaped into a rose, deep fried and then dipped in honey.

"I can remember my mother and grandmother cooking for days before the holiday. They lived to cook, and they loved preparing long, complicated recipes."

When Renee Barda, an opera singer, first ate a Rosh Hashanah meal at the home of her Italian in-laws with her late husband Dino, she felt as if she was living an opera.

"The table was set elegantly, the food was presented magnificently, and everyone was happy and laughing," says Barda, an Ashkenazi Jew from Toronto.

In Italy, she says, food is the language of love. "Everything is bought fresh, and it is cooked that day. They take pride in their cooking. When food is brought to the table, the women are excited if the men take particular notice of it."

The mini-seder is a formal ritual, says Barda.

"The head of the table dishes out the food into elegant porcelain bowls kept specifically for Rosh Hashanah, and passes a bowl and a special little fork to each person."

Guests are then given a piece from each of three frittatas – one made with calves' brains, one made with spinach and one made with leeks – prepared only at Rosh Hashanah.

The frittatas, prepared fresh for each night of Rosh Hashanah, are made with four well-beaten eggs, and cooked in small, round saucepans. "They puff up, and the top, sides and bottom form into a golden brown crustiness."

The main course, which contains no heavily spiced or sweet foods, is a "laborious stew that is served over light, fluffy and airy couscous.

"The women begin preparing the stew by stuffing vegetables such as onions, eggplant and tomatoes with a meat mixture. These pieces are then coated with an egg and flour mixture, then browned and stewed in a small amount of liquid. It is a unique Sephardi dish that I have never seen in a cookbook and is too difficult to write out," she says.

There is no such thing as serving leftovers during the holiday, says Barda. For lunch, they might prepare a pasta dish with small meatballs, a penne in tomato sauce, or a cabbage roll made with garlic, cinnamon and ground veal.

"The women have a tremendous desire to please through food," she says.

As a child growing up in Calcutta, India, Ruby Ezekiel looked forward to the High Holy Days because she always got a new outfit and shoes.

"The holidays were a big event for all the children; we were indulged by our parents and grandparents."

"We got dressed up and our dinner table was set with my grandmother's crystal dishes. The mini-seder made the meal a truly festive event," she says.

Before Rosh Hashanah, Ezekiel would accompany her father to the market to buy a chicken. "We would take it to the schochet and then my grandmother would kasher it.

"She would always give the kids jobs such as picking the rice, which was one of our staples. It was a very hot country, so termites and ants ran rampant."

Potatoes were a delicacy, she says. "I still remember when they appeared on our Rosh Hashanah or Shabbat table. They were perfectly cooked; I still have the taste in my mouth."

The following potato recipe from The Varied Kitchens of India by Copeland Marks, she says, "is reminiscent of my childhood."

ALOO-M-KALLA
Golden Deep-Fried Potatoes

The proper preparation of these famous potatoes is the yardstick by which Calcutta cooks are judged. Although much of the time the potatoes are prepared by household servants, who also are careful of their reputation, the menus are planned and presented by the woman of the house. She is chief of the household and, as such, responsible for the standards kept in it.

4 lbs. firm potatoes, about 24 small
2 tsp. salt
¼ tsp. ground turmeric
about 4 cups corn or peanut oil

Peel the whole potatoes evenly. Pour enough water to cover potatoes into a large saucepan. Bring the water to a boil with the salt and turmeric. Add the potatoes. Bring the water again to a boil over high heat for 1 minute. Drain and cool the potatoes. Make certain they are dry.

Arrange the potatoes in a low, flat 12-inch pot or wok. Cover them completely with oil. Bring this to a boil over medium to high heat, then lower heat immediately to a low simmer. Continue to simmer/fry for 1 hour, until the potatoes have formed a golden crust. Do not stir. Shake the pan once or twice during this process.

At this point, turn up the heat and cook them for 5 minutes longer, until they are brown. Remove the potatoes with a slotted spoon and drain them in a metal sieve or basket.

Serve immediately. The potatoes should have a crispy, firm exterior and a soft, melting interior. Serves 6 to 8.

Savoury memories

One of Eliane Tobin's fondest food memories growing up in Zaire were her mother's Rosh Hashanah pastries.

"My mother came from Rhodes and my father came from Kos, which are both part of the Greek Islands. Their custom was to serve yeast pastries during Rosh Hashanah, to represent both growth and the hope for a sweet year ahead."

She offers the following recipes:

SAVOURY PHYLLO PASTRIES (Ozaldres)

Filling:
3 tbsp. oil
1 lb. minced meat
1 cup water
2 tbsp. chopped parsley
2 hard-boiled eggs
salt, freshly ground pepper to taste

Pastry:
1 lb. phyllo pastry, refrigerated (from a deli) oil sesame seeds

Heat oil in saucepan and brown meat. Season and add water gradually. Cook until water evaporates and meat is tender. Cool. Add parsley and chopped hard-boiled eggs. Place two sheets of phyllo on each other and cut into 2-in. strips.

Dot each double strip lightly with oil. Place 1 dessert spoon of filling at lower end of strip and fold into triangular shape; keep folding all the way to the end of the strip. Place on lightly oiled baking tray. Brush with oil and sprinkle with sesame seeds. Bake at 350 for 20 min. or until golden.

DATE SHORTBREAD (Minenas)

Pastry:
¼ lb. margarine
2½ tbsps. icing sugar
1 egg
1 tsp. vanilla essence
2 cups flour (approximately) icing sugar

Filling:
½ lb. dates, chopped
¼ cup walnuts, chopped
rind of 1 lemon or orange
1½ tbsp. water
1 tsp. ground cloves and cinnamon
1 tbsp. butter

Cream margarine and sugar, add egg, vanilla essence and flour. Blend to a soft dough. Keep aside.

Mix filling ingredients together. Divide pastry into walnut-sized balls. Roll out each into a 2½-in. circle. Place a teaspoon of filling in centre of pastry circle. Lift edges of pastry on both sides. Bring together, closing the pastry over filling. Press fork lines diagonally across pastries to decorate. Line baking sheet with wax paper. Arrange pastry rolls ¾ in. apart. Bake at 350 until golden – about 20 min. Cool. Sprinkle with icing sugar.

Ruby Ezekiel holds a copy of the prayers used by her family before the Rosh Hashanah meal when she was growing up in Calcutta.

Light ways to break the fast

By SARAH WAXMAN
Special to The CJN

Breaking the fast in most families brings everyone closer together. After a day of reflection, atonement and forgiveness, each household seems to have its own food style. For some it's herring and honey cake, for others, coffee or tea and sweet yeast buns or bagels with cream cheese and lox.

But in my family we like to sit down at the dining table and eat a light meal, which must satisfy everyone including the vegans. Here are some of our family favourites.

SEA BASS WITH SWEET PEPPERS

1½ tbsp. extra-virgin olive oil
1 medium red bell pepper, cored, seeded and diced
1 medium yellow bell pepper, cored, seeded and diced
1 large garlic clove, chopped
1 green onion, chopped
4 sea bass steaks or fillets, about 1 inch thick (half pound each)
1 tsp. dried Italian herbs
2 tbsp. fresh chopped parsley
salt and freshly ground black pepper

Preheat the oven to 400. Heat the olive oil in a large skillet. Add the red and yellow peppers and sauté over medium-low heat 5 minutes. Remove from the heat and stir in the garlic and green onion.

Lightly oil a baking dish large enough to hold the fish in a single layer. Pour pepper mixture evenly over fish. Sprinkle evenly with dried herbs, salt and pepper to taste. Cover and bake 15 minutes or until fish is cooked through (do not overcook). Taste sauce and adjust seasoning.

Place fish on serving platter. With slotted spoon, arrange peppers over each piece. Spoon some of the cooking juices over fish. Sprinkle with fresh parsley. Serve fish hot or warm. Makes 4 servings.

COUSCOUS

2 lb couscous (semolina)
1 cup water
1 can chick peas, rinsed and drained
6 carrots, sliced
1 onion, chopped
1 acorn squash, peeled, cut in chunks
salt and pepper to taste
turmeric to taste
1 tsp. cinnamon
1 cup sugar

Prepare couscous according to package directions. In a pot, combine chick peas, vegetables and squash. Add water to cover and simmer together until tender (approx ½ hour). Add salt, pepper and turmeric. Mix together cinnamon and sugar. Set aside.

To serve, place couscous on the plate first, then pour vegetable mixture over top. Sprinkle with sugar and cinnamon.

CARROT KUGEL

¾ cup Crisco (or 1 cup oil)
½ cup dark brown sugar
1¼ cups flour
1 egg
2 tbsp. lemon juice
1 full cup grated carrots
1 tsp. cinnamon
½ tsp. salt
1 tsp. baking powder
1 tsp. baking soda

Cream together Crisco and brown sugar. Add remaining ingredients. Mix well. Grease a 6-cup pan and pour mixture in. Bake at 350 for 1 hour. May be served hot or cold. Serves 8. Recipe may be doubled for 12 cup bundt pan.

LOKSHEN KUGEL

1 package medium noodles
4 eggs
½ cup sugar
4 cups buttermilk
½ tsp. salt
½ cup butter or margarine
½ cup brown sugar
2 tbsp. soft butter or margarine
1 cup corn flake crumbs

Cook and drain noodles. Beat eggs, add sugar, buttermilk and salt. Add to cooked noodles. Melt ½ cup butter or margarine in 9x13 pan in a 350-degree oven. Pour melted butter into mixture. Pour mixture back in 9x13 pan. Bake at 350 about 40 minutes. Remove from oven and top with mixture of brown sugar, corn flake crumbs and the 2 tbsp. butter or margarine. Return to oven for 20 minutes.

Sephardi mini-seder: an elaborate ritual

By RIVKA TAL
Special to The CJN

Jews throughout the world share the custom of dipping the first piece of challah into honey on Rosh Hashanah. This is to symbolize our prayers for a good, sweet year. Many Jews also dip apple in honey with the same goal in mind. Everyone, however, is not familiar with the additional simanei milsa, significant omens, eaten by many communities on this night at the festive meal.

The custom is based on a talmudic teaching. According to Rashi, some of the foods taste sweet and symbolize a sweet year, while others are chosen because they grow profusely, thereby symbolizing our prayers that the Almighty will find us to have a profusion of merits. Some symbolize an increase in mitzvah observance, while others hint at the destruction and obliteration of the Jewish people's sins, as well as its enemies. A short recitation alluding to each particular food's symbolism is made before eating a bit of each.

Preparation of the simanim is usually kept simple, in line with the idea that the siman should be recognizable. Some add honey to everything!

(Note: One must take great care to check dates, pomegranates, black-eyed peas, leeks and Swiss chard for worms and bugs.)

In our home, we place bowls of each siman in the centre of the table on the first night and pass each in turn. For the second night, we prepare and serve small, individual plates containing a bit of each siman.

The following is a list of one order of simanim. Of course, everyone follows family custom.

Tamar (dates): Available fresh or dried. Halve, check and eat.

Rimon (pomegranate): We beseech God that our merits be as numerous as the seeds of the rimon. Did anyone ever count to determine if there really are 613 seeds? Perhaps this would occupy the children during the busy pre-holiday time. Removing the juicy seeds can be a labour-intensive task. Here's one method: Slice off the stem. Make four cuts through the skin, each starting at the exposed stem end and meeting at the opposite end. Break the fruit into quarters. Remove the seeds from each quarter with your fingers. You may find it helpful to immerse the rimon in water to dig out the seeds – the seeds will sink.

Tapuach (apple): Red varieties are the most popular for Rosh Hashanah. If you wish to cut them prior to the meal, be sure to cover them with lemon juice.

Karti: (leeks): Leeks look like giant scallions. Their broad, flat dark green leaves wrap tightly around each leek, whose insides resemble a tightly rolled newspaper.

Cucuzza is allowed to ripen on the vine

Since the insides contain a phenomenal amount of grit, the leeks must be slit from top to bottom and the "pages" unfolded and rinsed several times and inspected for infestation.

These are delicious sautéed with a bit of oil. Buy a large amount: most people enjoy them and a large quantity quickly shrinks down during cooking. Any leftovers may be used in cooking like fried onions.

Kareh (gourd): The large gourd known as kareh is called cucuzza, or snake squash, by U.S. greengrocers. It is imported to the North America from Italy. Like its winter squash cousins, cucuzza is allowed to ripen on the vine and has a hard shell and lots of seeds. It has a mild, quite bland flavour and is hard to peel.

Take my advice and buy as small a quantity as possible. Two pounds untrimmed squash equals 4 servings or about 2 cups cooked squash.

Halve the kareh lengthwise and scrape out seeds. Arrange the cut side down in a baking dish containing ¼ cup of water. Bake in a pre-heated 400-degree oven, uncovered, for 30 minutes. Turn cut side up; brush with margarine and season with salt and pepper, if desired. Continue baking until fork tender, 15-30 minutes. Alternately, stew in chunks, adding honey and/or salt and pepper according to taste.

Rubiya (black-eyed peas): Rubiya is usually available fresh at Rosh Hashanah time in Israel. In Canada, look for the dried legume, also known as cowpeas. Add 3 cups of cold water to ½ lb. dry black-eyes in a pot large enough for expansion. Let stand overnight or at least 6 hours at room temperature. Drain and discard water and rinse before cooking. Place in a large saucepan with 1 tablespoon of oil, 1 teaspoon of salt and 3 cups of hot water. Boil gently until tender, adding water to keep beans covered. This will yield 2½-3 cups of cooked beans.

Silka (Swiss chard): Trim, rinse, and rinse again; drain and pat dry; check for infestation. Cut dark green leaves into bite-sized pieces. Or prepare patties: Steam chard leaves briefly. Drain very well and mince. Add eggs, bread-crumbs and seasonings to taste. Form patties and fry. Drain well. Save chard stalks for stuffing, steaming, or use like asparagus. Leftover green leaves may be used like spinach.

Rosh shel Dag (head of a fish): Ask your local fishmonger to save you a couple of heads! Thoroughly clean and rinse the fish heads. Cover them with boiling water; add salt, pepper and sugar and/or lemon juice according to taste. Simmer, covered, for about ½ hour.

Adventures in Jewish Cooking updates kosher cuisine

By JUDY BART KANCIGOR

When it comes to kosher fine dining, chef Jeffrey Nathan of New York's Abigael's Restaurants wrote the book. Now just in time for Rosh Hashanah he's written Adventures in Jewish Cooking (Clarkson Potter), a collection of innovative recipes that redefine kosher as a world-class cuisine.

"I want our customers to think of Abigael's, not as a kosher restaurant, but as a great restaurant that happens to be kosher," says the chef whose PBS television show New Jewish Cuisine garnered a James Beard nomination.

And indeed they do. Jewish and non-Jewish diners alike, including Gov. Mario Cuomo and Donald Trump, return for the adventuresome menu, outstanding service and elegant ambiance.

With Adventures in Jewish Cooking, Nathan brings his imaginative, updated kosher cooking to the home chef, with dishes such as Porcini-Crusted Striped Bass and Port Wine Syrup, Chicken and Veal Pate, and Rack of Veal with Wild Mushroom Farfel Dressing.

"Kosher diners are more sophisticated today," he says. "A lot of people are more comfortable with the same things for Shabbat and the holidays, but when they go out to a restaurant, they don't want Shabbat roasted chicken."

Imaginative use of fresh ingredients and exotic influences from his travels

While the recipes reflect Nathan's imaginative use of fresh ingredients and exotic influences from his travels – Thai and Vietnamese are favourites – he gives more than a nod to his ancestral roots. And rather than being restricted by the laws of kashrut, he soars to the challenge of updating and recreating traditional dishes.

"It's not all about innovation," he writes. "I can derive just as much satisfaction from taking a recipe from my heritage and making it the best it can be," like Classic Chicken Soup with Matzo Balls, Sweet Noodle and Fruit Kugel and Superb Sabbath Cholent.

Nathan grew up in a predominantly Italian neighbourhood in Queens, N.Y., and loved to watch his mom cook. "Instead of watching TV, I was always potchking around in the kitchen," he recalls.

As a dishwasher in an Italian restaurant, he discovered a passion for cooking by watching the chefs. "They were so fast and just looked like they were having fun, but I didn't really think of it as a career. All I knew was Julia Child on television."

In the navy, Nathan became personal chef to the captain and officers, even cooking for Menachem Begin and Anwar Sadat.

"Not only did I get to travel around the world, but when we'd pull into ports, I was given money to go out and search for ingredients and could then come back and experiment."

After he left the navy, he attended the prestigious Culinary Institute of America under the GI bill. "You can't beat that. Travel the world, learn a trade, then go to school, all on Uncle Sam. That was one of the smarter things I ever did."

Nathan worked at a number of New York restaurants where he distinguished himself with unusual preparations of wild game and exotic meats, creating his now legendary Venison Chili, which later, as the only kosher entry, took first place in the James Beard National Chili Cook-Off.

"It was a blind tasting, and we were up against a lot of upscale Manhattan restaurants. When the kosher one won, no one could believe it!"

He opened Abigael's with partner Harvey Reizenman, and "[it] was my beshert (destiny)," he writes. "I realized that I had come home, both spiritually and professionally."

Adventures in Jewish Cooking showcases that same passion for the new and respect for the old. "I believe in modernization of everything," he says, "but then again there's tradition."

Nathan's holiday menus will inspire you to create new traditions of your own: Banana Soufganiot Pudding for Chanukah, Savory Hamantaschen with Vegetable-Cheese Stuffing for Purim, and I can't wait for Pesach to try the Matzo Napoleon with White Chocolate Mousse.

For Rosh Hashanah, we've selected Roast Duck with Apple-Golden Raisin Sauce. "I think I may be the world's number 1 duck fan," says Nathan, who divulges Abigael's double-cooking technique that guarantees a crispy skin without sacrificing moistness.

And what would Rosh Hashanah be without tzimmes? Nathan's Root Vegetable Tzimmes bursts with spices and dried fruit.

"It's very important to have something sweet for the New Year," he reminds us. "I usually keep desserts pareve, but for a dairy meal, I'll make Honey-Ginger Zabaglione Cream. It's harder to spell than to make it!"

And how will Nathan celebrate the New Year? "I always make taiglach at home with the kids," Chad, 13, and Jaclyn, 10, who appear in Adventures in Jewish Cooking clad in chef's coats, helping their dad prepare Chocolate Mousse Flowerpots.

"We make these little taiglach balls, dip them in honey and decorate them with chips or rainbow sprinkles or chopped pecans."

Some traditions never change.

Sample the wonders of Sephardi Israeli food

BY NORENE GILLETZ
Special to The CJN

Since biblical times Jews in Israel have eaten the foods of the land, many of which were mentioned in the Bible. After their expulsion from Spain, Jews came to the Holy Land and brought their cultural and dietary influences, as did other Jews from Greece, Italy, Morocco, Persia, Yemen, Ethiopia, and other countries. Today, Israel has developed an authentic food culture, which offers a wealth of colourful, rich and delicious choices, including foods that came from neighbouring Arab cultures. — Sheilah Kaufman, from her introduction to her latest cookbook, Sephardi Israeli Cuisine: A Mediterranean Mosaic.

According to American cookbook author and cooking teacher Sheilah Kaufman, Israeli cooking is like a giant, colourful mosaic or puzzle. The cuisine reflects the various communities and their diverse geographical and cultural origins.

Her 24th and latest cookbook, Sephardi Israeli Cuisine: A Mediterranean Mosaic (Hippocrene Books, $24.95 US), is a combination of her two favourite topics, cooking and history. It contains 120 wonderful kosher recipes that celebrate the flavours of Israeli cuisine, including a chapter of Ashkenazi recipes.

Sephardi ingredients include cinnamon, cloves, sumac, cardamom, hot chili, cumin, fenugreek, turmeric, saffron, almond essence, rose and orange flower water, coriander, tahini, artichokes, fava beans, olives, fennel, couscous, semolina and bulgur. You will learn how to make your own condiments and spices, including baharat and za'atar (Middle Eastern spice mixtures), preserved lemons and yogurt cheese (labaneh). I can't wait to try Tamar's Yemenite Chicken Soup, Chicken Pie (Bisteeya) and Tishpishti (Nut Cake with Sugar Syrup). The price of this book is far less expensive than a trip to the Middle East!

For the upcoming High Holy Days, bring the flavour of the Middle East to your table with this scrumptious sampling of Sephardi Israeli cuisine.

MEDITERRANEAN CHICKEN

This dish is sweet, salty, pungent and delicious. The prunes and olives make a sensational flavour combination. This is a perfect recipe for company, and can be easily doubled or even tripled. It tastes even better the next day.

Marinade:

1 cup pitted prunes
½ cup chopped green olives
4 bay leaves
8 large garlic cloves, minced
3 tbsp. dried oregano
½ cup red wine vinegar
½ cup extra-virgin olive oil juice of 1 lime

10 to 14 pieces of chicken (1 to 2 per person)

For Baking:
1 cup white wine (something fairly sweet)
½ cup chopped fresh parsley or cilantro

Mix ingredients for the marinade. Place chicken in a non-reactive bowl (e.g., clay, copper, enamel, glass, plastic or stainless steel) or plastic storage bag, then add the marinade. Refrigerate covered (if using bowl), overnight.

Preheat oven to 350. Place the chicken in a single layer, skin side up, in a shallow roasting pan. Pour marinade on top and pour the wine around it. Bake about 1 hour, basting from time to time.

Sprinkle with parsley or cilantro before serving. Pass pan juices separately. Serves eight. Freezes and reheats well.

MOROCCAN SWEET CARROTS

A family recipe from Judith Amrani. Orange flower water is a fragrant liquid distilled from orange blossoms and used as a flavouring in dishes, and especially in desserts. It is available at Middle Eastern groceries.

orange flower water gives this dish its special taste.)

1/3 cup honey
1/4 cup lemon juice
8 to 10 carrots, peeled and shredded
1/2 cup raisins (optional)
1 tbsp. orange flower water

Dissolve the honey in the lemon juice. Add the carrots and raisins, if desired, and mix well.

Sprinkle with orange flower water and let carrots sit an hour or longer before serving, or cover and refrigerate until serving. The longer it marinates, the better it gets. Serves 4. Recipe can be doubled or tripled easily for a crowd.

EGGPLANTS WITH TOMATO SAUCE (IMAN BAYALDI)

The story says that a famous Turkish priest or Iman was so delighted with his wife's eggplant creation that he passed out or fainted from pure pleasure, hence the name iman bayaldi, meaning "the priest has fainted."

Sometimes this dish is referred to as "sultan's swoon." There are many versions of this dish and some include meat. If possible, prepare this a day or two ahead so the flavours can mellow.

6 Asian (long, narrow) eggplants or 6 small (6 to 7 inches each) baby eggplants salt
4 tbsp. olive oil
3 medium onions, peeled and sliced thin
6 garlic cloves, finely chopped
3 large tomatoes, peeled, seeded and chopped
1 tsp. salt
freshly ground pepper
1 tbsp. sugar
1 tsp. cinnamon
1/4 cup plus 3 tbsp. chopped fresh parsley
3 to 4 tbsp. pine nuts (optional)
1/2 cup extra-virgin olive oil
juice of 1/2 lemon

Preheat oven to 350. Wash the eggplants, cut off the stem ends and slice them in half lengthwise. With a sharp knife, peel off 1/2-inch strips of skin lengthwise at intervals for a striped effect.

On the pulp (or cut) side, make at least 3 lengthwise slashes, being careful not to pierce the skin on the opposite side. Sprinkle the eggplants with salt and let them stand for 30 minutes. Rinse with cold water, dry, and turn them over on paper towel to drain well.

Heat 2 tbsp. of the oil and sauté the onions and garlic. Add the tomatoes and cook another 2 minutes. Add salt and pepper to taste, sugar, cinnamon, and 1/4 cup parsley, mixing well. Cook for a minute, then remove the pan from the heat and set aside. Stir in nuts if desired.

Heat the remaining 2 tbsp. of oil and saute eggplants (in batches if necessary) until tender. Turn eggplants several times while sautéing. A little more heated oil may be needed. Remove eggplants from pan and place in a shallow baking dish.

Drain the onion mixture and stuff the slashes of the eggplant with it, allowing some of the filling to cover the top of the eggplants. Grind some pepper over the top of each eggplant and sprinkle with the remaining 3 tbsp. of parsley.

Whisk together the extra-virgin olive oil, lemon juice, and 1 cup of water. Pour over and around the eggplants. Cover with aluminum foil or a lid. Bake until eggplants are tender until pierced with a fork, 15 to 20 minutes. Remove the cover for the last 10 minutes of baking.

Remove the pan from the oven and transfer eggplants onto a serving platter. Let them cool to room temperature. Serves 6.

SWEET CHALLAH: A traditional part of every Rosh Hashanah meal.

CHOCOLATE SALAMI

This interesting no-bake cookie is so named because the slices resemble salami. They are very rich. The recipe is also called Chocolate Mosaic in Jewish homes in Istanbul.

1 lb. vanilla wafers
1 cup sweet red wine
1 1/4 cups sugar
1/4 cup cocoa or 5 ounces European bittersweet chocolate
1 cup margarine
1 tsp. vanilla
1 1/2 cups chopped pecans
8 marshmallows, cut into small pieces (optional)

Break the wafers into small pieces. Combine the wine, sugar, cocoa (or chocolate) and margarine in a pot over medium heat. Stir and cook, mixing well, until the margarine is melted.

Stir in vanilla, nuts, cookies and marshmallows (if desired).

Form candy mixture into rolls or logs about 2 inches wide and wrap tightly in foil. Freeze until ready to serve, then slice and keep refrigerated. Makes about 36 pieces. Serves 10.

BIBLE FOODS: Galit Ziegman cooks food from recipes she created by referring to the Bible, the Mishnah, a 2,800-year-old Mesopotamian cookbook, and a recipe book by Roman gastronomist Apicius.

¼ cup (½-inch dice) dried apricots
¼ cup (½-inch dice) pitted dried plums (prunes)
2 cups fresh orange juice
⅓ cup honey
grated zest of ½ orange grated zest of ½ lemon
1 tsp. kosher salt
½ tsp. ground cinnamon
½ tsp. freshly grated nutmeg
¼ tsp. ground allspice
¼ tsp. freshly ground black pepper

Melt the margarine in a large saucepan over medium heat. Add the onion and cook, stirring occasionally, until golden, about 5 minutes. Stir in the sweet potatoes, carrots, parsnips, apricots, prunes, orange juice, honey, orange and lemon zest, salt, cinnamon, nutmeg, allspice and pepper, and bring to a boil.

Cover and reduce the heat to medium-low. Simmer, stirring frequently, until the vegetables are tender, about 30 minutes. If necessary, uncover and cook until the orange juice has evaporated, about 3 minutes.

Transfer to a bowl and serve immediately. (The tzimmes can be made up to two days ahead, cooled, covered and refrigerated. Reheat before serving.) Makes 8 servings.

ROAST DUCK WITH APPLE-GOLDEN RAISIN SAUCE

Roast Duck
1 Granny Smith apple, unpeeled, cut into quarters
1 seedless orange, cut into quarters
2 5-lb. ducklings, rinsed and patted dry
½ tsp. coarsely cracked (butcher-grind) black pepper

Apple-Raisin Sauce
¼ cup cider vinegar
¼ cup sugar
1 whole star anise pod
2 Granny Smith apples, peeled, cored, and chopped into ½-inch dice
½ cup apple cider
¼ cup golden raisins
⅛ tsp. ground cinnamon
¼ cup brandy
1 tsp. cornstarch

Position a rack in the centre of the oven and preheat to 450.

Stuff 2 each of the apple and orange quarters in the cavity of each duck. Season the duck with the pepper. Using the upturned tines of a meat fork, prick the duck skin all over, especially in the fatty thigh and breast areas, being careful not to pierce the flesh. Place them, breast side up, on a large roasting rack set in a large roasting pan (if you don't have a rack large enough, fashion a rack from foil).

Roast the ducks for 1 hour. Reduce the heat to 400 and roast until the ducks are deep golden brown and an instant-read thermometer inserted in the thickest part of the thigh reads 180, about 30 minutes. Remove the pan from the oven, being careful not to spill the rendered fat in the pan, and allow to cool completely.

Using poultry shears, cut each duck in half lengthwise. Pull off and discard the carcass and thigh bone from each duck, leaving four semiboneless duck halves with the wings attached. (It's amazing how flexible the duck is and how easily this is accomplished. Your hands will get a little greasy, but that's the only drawback.) Cover and refrigerate for up to one day.

To make the sauce, combine the vinegar, sugar and star anise in a small saucepan. Cook over medium heat, swirling the pan occasionally by the handle to combine the ingredients until they melt into a syrup and it turns golden brown, about 3 times. Stir in the apples, cider, raisins and cinnamon. Bring to a simmer. Cook until the apples are tender but hold their shape, about 10 minutes. Pour the brandy into a small bowl, sprinkle the cornstarch over it, and whisk to dissolve. Whisk the mixture into the simmering sauce to thicken, and cover to keep warm.

When ready to serve, heat the oven to 450. Place the duck halves, skin side up, on a baking sheet with sides. Add 1 cup hot water to the pan (this is just enough to create some steam). Bake until the skin is crisp and sizzling and the meat is heated through, about 15 minutes. Serve the duck with the sauce passed on the side. Makes 4 servings.

HONEY-GINGER ZABAGLIONE CREAM WITH FRESH BERRIES

Berries
4 cups assorted fresh berries, such as blueberries, blackberries, raspberries, and sliced strawberries
2 tbsp. sparkling sweet wine
2 tbsp. sugar

Zabaglione Cream
6 large egg yolks
¼ cup sparkling sweet wine, such as Moscato d'Asti
¼ cup sugar
2 tbsp. honey
1 tsp. finely minced fresh ginger, peeled, shredded on the large holes of a box grater, then minced
1 star anise (5 or 6 points)
¼ cup heavy cream

To prepare the berries, mix the berries, sparkling wine and sugar in a medium bowl. Cover and refrigerate to chill and allow the berries to give off some juices, at least 2 and up to 8 hours.

To make the zabaglione cream, use a large balloon whisk to beat the yolks, sparkling wine, sugar, honey and ginger in a medium stainless-steel bowl. Add the star anise and place over a saucepan of steadily simmering, but not boiling, water (the bottom of the bowl should not touch the water). Whisk constantly (or beat with a hand-held electric mixer on high speed) until the mixture is pale yellow and fluffy, about 7 minutes. When the whisk is lifted an inch or so above the zabaglione, the mixture should be thick enough to hold its shape on the surface for a few seconds before sinking.

Remove from the heat and place the bowl in a larger bowl of ice water. Let stand until the zabaglione is completely cooled. Discard the star anise.

Whip the heavy cream in a chilled medium bowl until stiff peaks form. Fold the whipped cream into the zabaglione. (The mixture can be prepared up to 4 hours ahead, covered with plastic wrap and refrigerated.)

When ready to serve, spoon the berries and their juices into 6 large martini glasses. Spoon the zabaglione over the berries. If desired, using a propane torch, pass the flame over the zabaglione until very lightly browned. Serve immediately. Makes 6 servings.

Pareve Variation: Substitute 1½ cups nondairy whipped topping for the whipped cream.

An Israeli spin on Shakespeare's King Lear

By JEFF BERCUSON
Special to The CJN

There are few literary images as powerful as that of the frenzied King Lear raging against the wind and rain in William Shakespeare's play.

Having conceded his land and power to his two scheming daughters, and lost the love of Cordelia, his only faithful daughter, Lear is forced to wander his former kingdom, descending further and further into madness.

When York University theatre student Antony Nesling, 22, decided to make William Shakespeare's King Lear his directorial debut, the last thing he wanted was another conventional production.

Recognizing the parallels of war and survival between Lear's England and the Yom Kippur War of 1973, Nesling decided to put a contemporary spin on what he calls the playwright's "literary masterpiece."

"I looked all around the world to find the endurance exhibited by Lear in his search for Cordelia," he says. "The only place I could find [a parallel to] Lear's refusal to give up was in Israel. The Israeli people have made it quite clear that no matter what happens, they're just going to carry on."

For Nesling, literature's greatest tragedy seemed to pair naturally with the ongoing situation in Israel, the "world's biggest tragedy."

"Like Lear, it is obvious that you're not going to get an ideal, utopian vision of Israel without a certain amount of tragedy. Unfortunately, it takes a certain amount of pain before we can learn and progress."

Disaffected young people: The cast of Lear, King of Israel

In this modern adaptation, called Lear, King of Israel, France and England are no longer the two feuding nations. Gone, too, are the feuding dukes Albany and Cornwall. Instead, there's Egypt and Israel and the dukes Zion and Gaza.

The play, which is performed by a group of sabras, takes place in Tel Aviv on the eve of the Yom Kippur War.

"Changing the setting makes the tragedy immediately accessible to a modern day Jewish audience," says the director, who also plays the doomed monarch.

The inclusion of the sabras touches on an important theme prevalent in both Lear and prewar Israel: a younger generation in conflict with its predecessors.

"The story is centred around a group of very disaffected young people, who had this feeling of invincibility after the Israeli victory of 1967," says Nesling, who spent two years researching and preparing his adaptation.

It is these "disaffected" young people that Nesling believes will ultimately be responsible for finding a resolution to the enduring Middle East conflict.

"It was, and continues to be, the younger generation that takes a more realistic approach to the conflict, promoting the notion of equality. They are the ones promoting the idea that if everyone came at the problem with the same objective, we could find a middle ground."

Although the production is told from a Jewish-Israeli perspective, Nesling, who is Jewish , stresses that it does not approach the conflict from a strictly Jewish point of view.

"The play has no political agenda and comes from a humanist perspective," he says. "Not only is it a celebration of Jewish and Israeli culture and heritage, it will also be a piece of hope for the future in the Middle East, regardless of race or religion."

The play's succession of terrible events, eerily similar to the seemingly endless wave of suicide bombings, raises another important question that pervades all of Shakespeare's work: is there any possibility of finding peace in the world?

"Of course there is hope for peace," he says. "There wouldn't be any point to doing the play if we didn't have hope for peace in the future."

In fact, Nesling doesn't even consider King Lear to be a tragedy.

"We look at this as a play about love and family, two things that are extremely important to Jewish culture. We don't see Lear as a play about nihilism and death and tragedy," he says. "Every time we approach a scene, the one question we ask ourselves is, 'Where's the love?'"

Lear, King of Israel will be performed Aug. 27 to 29 at the Leah Posluns Theatre at the Bathurst Jewish Community Centre. The proceeds of the play, which is being produced by the Toronto Art Theatre, will be donated to Canadian Magen David Adom for Israel. For tickets, call the box office at 416-780-0034.

The golden age of radio

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

If you are old enough to remember listening to radio shows such as The Lone Ranger and Tonto, The Shadow, Inner Sanctum and The Lux Theatre, you will enjoy a trip down memory lane with The Blue Coal Trio.

The golden age of radio, from 1930 to the mid-1950s, comes back to life in an entertaining presentation for live audiences by these three Toronto men who have each been involved in media for more than half a century.

Carl Banas, a well-known broadcaster, Sam Levene, a prolific radio and television writer and producer, and Ken Borden, a multi-talented adman, artist and broadcaster, collect anything and everything related to the radio of yesteryear.

They formed the Blue Coal Trio (named for the company that sponsored The Shadow) seven years ago when they were invited by the Friends of Old Time Radio of Newark, N.J., to create a program for the group's annual convention.

The subject was What Canada Contributed to the Golden Age of Radio.

Borden told The CJN that their program included Wayne and Shuster, and The Happy Gang, as well as the first broadcast by legendary Hockey Night in Canada announcer Foster Hewitt.

"This program was super well-received," said Borden.

It led the three to combine their talents and resources and form The Blue Coal Trio, which has performed in Canada and the United States.

Their program is filled with nostalgia, humour, music, suspense and brings back many memories for people over 50.

"We try to tickle and tease your memory," Borden said. "We love doing it and we get turned on by the audience's involvement."

As they play their audio golden oldies and present a running dialogue and commentary, members of the audience spontaneously sing along with the theme songs from the old shows and commercials and shout out references to their own favourites.

Avid radio listeners might remember Banas as one of the broadcasters on CKEY's Make Believe Ballroom and the host of CKFM's All Night Show for 23 years, as well as for his acting work on the CBC series Wojeck, among others.

Levene has been involved in both radio and television and was producer and writer of CBC television's Man Alive.

Borden, who attended Harbord Collegiate and went on to study art and design, was successful in advertising and marketing.

He said it requires imagination to write for radio, which once brought families together.

"I remember as a child being in the living room with our entire family on Sunday evening to listen to Jack Benny and Amos 'n Andy. We listened together, we talked together and laughed together. This does not happen with television," he said with regret."

For more information on The Blue Coal Trio, or for booking information, call Borden at 416-224-8184, fax 416-224-0558.

ASHKENAZ FESTIVAL CELEBRATES NEW YIDDISH CULTURE

Ashkenaz, Toronto's huge three-day festival of new Yiddish culture, returns to Harbourfront Centre Aug. 31 through Sept. 2. Presented in partnership with the Miles Nadal JCC, the festival offers a wealth of klezmer music, theatre, dance, storytelling, comedy, poetry, film and visual arts.

So many worthy events are crammed into the three days that only a brief summary can be presented here. While some require paid admission, many are free. Some times and ticket prices are shown below.

Karen Kaeja (top) and Allen Kaeja (below) perform Sarah and two other pieces at Ashkenaz.

Musical artists include Anthony Coleman's Los Professionales, who fuse jazz and Sephardi music; the Cracow Klezmer Band making a Canadian debut; Di Naye Kapelye, a central European band that specializes in historically accurate music from Hungary and Romania; Toronto's Flying Bulgar Klezmer Band; and Khevrisa and other klezmer talents.

Theatrical offerings include the play Kafka & Son, directed by Mark Cassidy and featuring actor Alon Nashman; and the musical Seder, a Michael Rubinoff production that blends traditional Yiddish and klezmer tunes with rocking beats.

The Miles Nadal JCC presents a sing-along version of Norman Jewison's 1971 film musical Fiddler on the Roof, sponsored by Greenco Property Management Inc. Audience members are invited to don babushkas, beards, wedding veils and other accoutrements during the film, whose cast includes Topol, Molly Picon and Leonard Frey.

Toronto actor-singer David Gale leads the vocal warm-up and all participants receive an interactive pack. Harbourfront Concert Stage. Tickets $10. Thursday, Aug. 29, 8 p.m. 416-973-4000.

Another cinematic offering is Jewish Luck, a classic Soviet silent film and a funny adaptation of the Sholom Aleichem story, Mendel the Matchmaker. The film features Solomon Mikhoels, the Yiddish State Art Theatre actor making a Chaplinesque cinematic debut. Two screenings feature musical accompaniment by the Cracow Klezmer Band and Anthony Coleman, respectively. Tickets $10.

Two Canadian dance companies are presenting five new dance works. Kaeja d'Dance performs Sarah, the story of a woman who vanished during the Holocaust, and two other pieces; while the Yukon dance troupe Link performs two pieces, including This Too Shall Pass, a re-creation of the Passover seder.

Other highly anticipated Ashkenaz events include a performance of Milton Barnes' Dos Naye Lid by the Toronto Jewish Folk Choir with a six-piece female orchestra; and David Buchbinder's Shurum Burum, featuring eight musicians, multiple compositions, two circus performer/clowns and audience participation.

The festival also features a lively pageant, with revellers, singers, dancers, stiltwalkers and clowns. It closes with the Ashkenaz Finale, described as a "hot klezmer jam session... that promises to leave everyone dancing" in the aisles.

For full times and ticket information, contact the Harbourfront Info Hotline at 416-973-3000 or visit the Web site, www.ashkenazfestival.com.

Arts in Brief

• Author James Dieter Guinter-Saginario has produced a science fiction fantasy novel in which some high-level Nazis are transplanted from Earth and establish a Hitlerian fourth reich in a distant galaxy. The book, Second Chances, was published by 1stBooks Library as the first release in its Homeland Series. www.1stbooks.com.

• Two Artists, One Goat is an exhibition of works by abstract artist Frank Stella and Israeli painter Nira Savir that explores the hidden allegory in the traditional Passover folksong Chad Gadya. Spertus Museum, Chicago. Sept. 30 through Feb. 28, 2003. www.spertus.edu.

Adath Israel Concert: Accomplished musicians and teachers Judith and Joseph Peleg, who play piano and violin respectively, perform a benefit concert in memory of Jennie Kernkraut, a teacher, writer, raconteur and Holocaust survivor who died one year ago.

The public is invited; refreshments to follow. Tickets are $15, $10 for seniors and students, available in advance at Adath Israel or at the door. Proceeds go to the Canadian Magen David Adom. Adath Israel Congregation, 37 Southbourne Ave., Toronto. Wed. August 28, 8 p.m.

CHINA THROUGH JEWISH EYES

The fascinating history of the Jews in China is the focus of two travel adventures being offered by Toronto travel professional Harriet Morton in 2003.

Morton conducted her first Jewish tour to China in April. First stop was Shanghai, where Jews were accepted as "stateless refugees" during World War II when most other places refused to admit them. Points of interest included the Ohel Moishe Synagogue and the historic Hongkou ghetto, which sheltered 18,000 Jews during the period.

Next came a cruise on the Yangtze River to the Three Gorges area and a visit to Kaifeng, once the centre of an ancient and flourishing Jewish community. In Xian, the group viewed thousands of life-sized terra cotta warriors at the tomb of the first emperor Qin Shi Huang. Also included were a Sabbath service and dinner with the Jewish community of Beijing, and visits to the Great Wall, Tiananmen Square and the Forbidden City.

Morton conducted her "Jewish China" tour last April; a second, scheduled for October, was almost fully booked soon after the first had concluded. The 2003 tours are 14 days long and scheduled to depart April 30 and Oct. 13. Contact Morton at Tour East Holidays, 1033 Bay St., Suite 302, Toronto. 416-929-8017. Web site: www.toureast.ca.

Israel's Fall Migration: Twice each year, in spring and in fall, millions of birds pass through Israel while migrating between Asia and Europe. In the fall, birds fly from Africa over Eilat, north through the Negev Desert or over the Dead Sea in the Arava and Jordan Valleys, and up through the Galilee.

The Hula Valley in northeastern Israel is one of the most important bird-watching sites in the Middle East. Enormous flocks of about 390 species fly through an area of about 32 square miles. Pelican, cranes and many other species concentrate in large flocks in the valley. Last year about 30 raptor species were observed.

Last January, volunteers counted well over 1,000 black storks, mainly in the Beit Shean Valley and along the coast, as well as many great black-headed gulls and pygmy cormorants in the same regions. The Gamla Nature Reserve has become known for the griffon, bearded and black vultures that nest there, as well as many other types of vulture that have been sighted soaring aloft.

Further east, at Kibbutz Kfar Ruppin in the Jordan Valley, some 90 species of songbirds have been banded in the last five years. The ringing station welcomes visitors and offers educational explanations of the ringing process and the great migrations.

The Society for the Protection of Nature in Israel organizes bird-watching tours with professional guides. Their Web site is www.spni.org.il. For further information on travel to Israel, visit the Web site www.goisrael.com.

Movie mogul's rise and fall

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Movie producer Robert Evans was the quintessential Hollywood player. A perennial cigar clenched in his mouth, his handsome Mediterranean face framed by oversize glasses, he was a larger-than-life figure in the American film industry in the 1970s.

As senior vice-president of Paramount Pictures, Evans churned out a remarkable string of commercial and critical successes, from Love Story and Rosemary's Baby to Chinatown and The Godfather.

Not bad for a guy who was once a womenswear manufacturer in New York City.

Evans' saga, the rise and fall of a movie mogul, is the subject of The Kid Stays in the Picture, now playing at the Varsity theatre. Based on his ribald 1994 biography, it is a superb, hugely entertaining documentary.

The directors/producers, Brett Morgan and Nanette Burstein, let Evans do the talking. Although he has a tendency to slur his words, as if he has marbles in his mouth, Evans' tale is so compelling that a viewer can ignore this problem.

Evans, whose family history is unfortunately glossed over in this otherwise excellent film, was an accidental producer.

A principal of a garment company that popularized ladies' pants as a fashion accessory, Evans was discovered by the actress Norma Shearer, a star of the 1930s, while he was lounging around the swimming pool of a posh Beverly Hills hotel.

Impressed by his handsome looks and his personable manner, Shearer asked Evans if he wanted to be in the movies. Evans, a thespian at heart, jumped at the opportunity.

The film he was to star in, as a dashing bullfighter, was The Sun Also Rises, based on Ernest Hemingway's great 1920s novel. Evans spent three months in Mexico preparing for the role, but when he showed up, everyone on the set, including Hemingway, wanted him fired.

Darryl Zanuck, the legendary producer, would not hear of it. "The kid stays in the picture," he declared in no uncertain terms.

As it happened, Evans' detractors were right. Evans had the smouldering appearance of a Spanish bullfighter, but he was no actor. Nonetheless, his career was launched.

In short order, Evans made a succession of movies, virtually all execrable. Taking stock, he decided that his only chance of succeeding in Hollywood would be as a producer.

Teaming up with Peter Bart, the former Hollywood reporter of The New York Times, Evans bought the rights to a novel and convinced a studio to convert it into a movie. He never looked back.

By the age of 34, in a Horatio Alger-like transformation, Evans was running Paramount, a lacklustre studio that had teetered on the brink of bankruptcy.

Evans, an engaging raconteur, tells how he convinced Mia Farrow, the lead in Rosemary's Baby, to finish the movie on schedule despite the bullying protests of her strong-willed husband, Frank Sinatra.

And Evans' relationship with, and subsequent marriage to, the star of Love Story, Ali McGraw, is truly the stuff of melodrama.

Love Story, a blockbuster hit, saved Evans from the breadline. The directors of Paramount, for reasons never really explained, wanted to dump Evans. But when he showed them excerpts of Love Story, they immediately changed their minds.

Evans' decision to hire Francis Ford Coppola to direct The Godfather was a brilliant move. Jewish directors had usually been assigned to gangster films. But in this instance, an Italian American was given the nod. Evans and Coppola had monumental fights, on and off set, but their partnership produced an iconic series of films.

No less a personage than Henry Kissinger, president Richard Nixon's extremely busy and preoccupied national security advisor, appeared at the film's premiere. Such was Evans' clout.

For Evans, the 1980s were lost years. His wife left him, taking up with actor Steve McQueen, and he got hooked on drugs. He was also a suspect in a tawdry murder case. His career plummeted, and, in the process, he lost his exquisite Hollywood mansion-cum haven.

Thanks to loyal friends like Jack Nicholson, Evans bounced back with such films as Sliver and The Saint. Evans is still around, but he is no longer a mover and shaker.

As the credits for The Kid Stays in the Picture roll, an outtake from Wag the Dog, starring Dustin Hoffman, comes on screen. Hoffman, in an inspired turn, satirizes Evans brilliantly. It's a fitting end to an accomplished movie.

Argos owner honoured by Chabad Lubavitch

By ELI SHUPAK
Special to The CJN

Faced with declining attendance figures, Toronto Argonauts owner Sherwood Schwarz hired former entertainment mogul Garth Drabinsky to serve as the club's marketing consultant.

"We have made a 180-degree turn under Garth Drabinsky, really planning out all our entertainment and off-the-field moves," Schwarz said in a telephone interview from his Park Avenue office in New York. "He and [president] Michael [Pinball] Clemons I think have done a yeoman's job in increasing our ticket sales. I think we're going to have a very successful off-the-football-field season."

The team is hoping the allure of family packs and kosher Krispy Kreme donuts, along with half-time concerts and an Austin Powers bobblehead doll giveaway may help sell more tickets.

The highly-successful life insurance salesman encouraged more Jews to come out and cheer the Argos when he was honoured by the Shmuel Zahavy Cheder Chabad at its 14th annual fundraising gala, A Celebration of Jewish Song and Spirit, held at the Sheraton Centre. Schwarz is a devoted member of the Cheder Chabad family despite only being involved with the school for a few months.

Students at Cheder Chabad, a Jewish day school, study in an environment imparting the values, lifestyle, and warmth of the Lubavitch movement.

"Sherwood is known to be a charitable person, a person who cares for kids," said Rabbi Yona Shur, the school's executive director. "He values the importance of helping children and very much admires the work of Chabad. The combination of the two was what inspired him to put his name to this event.

"Sherwood was willing to accept this honour thereby helping our school raise the necessary funds to give the proper education that children that need scholarships can receive," Rabbi Shur said.

Schwarz also serves on the board of directors for Chai Lifeline, an international non-profit organization that provides vital services to seriously ill Jewish children and their families. It is set to open its first Canadian office in Toronto.

Schwarz, who was born in 1930 in the Lower East Side of New York, purchased the team in December 1999 and expects the next person to run the franchise will be his 14-year-old grandson.

He says he's with the Argos for the long haul and still has every reason to believe that things will turn around for the team. But he remains puzzled by the poor fan turnout in recent years.

"Here's a franchise that's more than 125 years old, would it be better to have it someplace else?" pondered Schwarz. "I don't understand how people don't support a franchise like that."

Israeli pole vaulter wins gold in Munich

By RAMI HIPSH
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Alex Averbukh last week became the first Israeli to win a major athletics title, taking the gold medal in the pole vault event at the European Championships in Athletics in Munich.

Coming a day before a memorial service for the victims of the Sept. 5 attack by Palestinians at the 1972 Olympics that resulted in the death of 11 Israeli athletes, Averbukh's triumph was highly emotional. Afterwards, the 27-year-old athlete, draped in the Israeli flag, fought back tears as Hatikvah was played to a packed house.

"Of course I know about the tragic events from 1972, but I think sometimes you need to put the past behind you and think of the future," said the Russian-born Averbukh, who has been through hard times after the death of his father, who was also his coach, last December.

"I would like to dedicate this medal to him," he said.

"I also dedicate this medal to the people of Israel," said Averbukh, who received a congratulatory call from Foreign Minister Shimon Peres. "I want to give a little present to the Israeli people because the news from there is not so good."

All 17 Israeli athletes competing at the 2002 European championships, as well as relatives of victims of the 1972 killings, took part in a memorial ceremony at a monument erected outside the stadium.

Averbukh, who was flanked by three security guards at the championship when he wasn't on the field, cleared the bar on his first attempt at 5.85 metres, smashing his season's best of 5.72. He then made a single attempt at 5.95 metres, four centimetres higher than his own Israeli record, but after failing once, he chose instead to celebrate his medal with a series of somersaults on the track.

Though he has only been competing in Israel for the past four years, Averbukh says he already feels strongly about his adopted country. "I feel 50 per cent Israeli, 50 per cent Russian," said Averbukh, who lives in Tel Aviv with his wife, Natasha, and seven-year-old daughter, Tanya, when he is not training abroad.

Averbukh, who had never jumped over 5.70 metres before moving to Israel, rarely delivers during the season but has a reputation for coming through at big events. He won the bronze at the 1999 World Championships in Seville three days after receiving his Israeli citizenship, and won the 2000 European indoor title before clinching silver at the last World Championships in Edmonton.

Averbukh's personal best is a jump of 5.91 metres. The world outdoor record of 6.14 metres is held by Ukrainian Sergei Bubka, now retired.

With his new coach Valery Kogan – who used to train Rodion Gataulin, one of the few six-metre pole-vaulters – Averbukh doesn't train much in Israel because it is too hot.

"Alex is the most talented of all the vaulters I have trained," Kogan said. "I am very happy that we have managed to achieve our goal and win the gold medal. The fact that we did it in Munich was of great symbolic importance."

On Averbukh's return to Israel, Sports Minister Matan Vilnai awarded him a prize of NIS 70,000 (about $23,300 Cdn). Kogan received NIS 30,000 from Israel's Elite Sports Unit.

Sporting a new, shaved-head look, Averbukh said "I am very pleased and very proud of what I have achieved."

He shaved his head, he added, on a bet with a fellow competitor that he would do so if he won the gold medal.

"It was a bet, but it also symbolizes the end of an era and the beginning of another because I now want to concentrate my efforts on achieving even greater things," he said.

High Holy Day call to arms

By AVRUM ROSENSWEIG

The Jewish world is suffering. Many of our people are weary and heartbroken. They have been worn down by the stabbing screams of mourners, harmonizing with the relentless tears, flowing like a hideous blackened stream, at the funerals of our sons and daughters.

Van Gogh painted a picture called La Siesta. In it, a husband and wife lie together on the ground, at one against a sheaf of wheat, tired from the day's harvest. Unlike the sleepy workers, it is too early for our children to be called back to the earth, to be at one with God. So we are tired.

The tired should sleep. They should gather their strength and soon rejoin the others in the Jewish struggle we have accepted with honour and obstinacy.

Then there are the rested ones, those who have the strength of a lion and the fortitude of a bricklayer. It is their turn to accept the job of maintaining, protecting, fortifying and enriching the Jewish people.

We ask those who are rested to repair the broken nose of our parched, valiant and lonely State of Israel and to actualize the words of Hatikvah... to be a free nation, in our own land.

Stand up proudly – courageously – on Rosh Hashanah and Yom Kippur as you walk by the guard defending your synagogue. Don't cower at anti-Semitism. Battle it. Pace yourself. Be sensible. But be a warrior.

We need those who are rested to accept the yoke of responsibility to assist the Jews of Argentina – a community that has gone through a metamorphosis, ending in great poverty and melancholy.

The Jewish community of Argentina is collapsing. They need us, like we might need them one day.

If Toronto were experiencing what Buenos Aires is, CHAT, Bialik, Eitz Chaim, Leo Baeck and Netivot would all be closed. Thirty-six thousand families would be at Jewish Family & Child Service's door. Jews in Forest Hill might be living in tin houses.

Those who are rested cannot fail the first post-war western Jewish community to collapse under the weight of economic hideousness. They cannot forfeit the number one challenge in Judaism – loving your neighbour. Speak to your rabbi. Speak to your federation and to B'nai Brith. Speak to your social activism committee. Help them. They are Jews in dire distress.

This is a High Holy Day call to arms. Those who have fought relentlessly for decades, ensuring the continuity of the Jewish people – be they individuals or organizations – can no longer do it on their own. The battle has grown.

To be a Jew is to fight. To be a Jew is to learn and grow. To be a Jew is to spread decency. To be a Jew is to open your home and your heart to anyone in need, regardless of their demeanour, place of birth or quirkiness. We were once strangers in a strange land.

Activism and leadership are difficult. Initially, Moses turned them down.

In 5763, commit to emulating the warriors in our neighbourhood who refused to go home, even when the war is seemingly ending. To be a Jew is to sleep restlessly. To be a Jew is to receive back our souls, with God's faith, upon wakening. That is our lot. That is what we must accept. L'shana Tovah. Happy New Year.

If the community is in trouble, a person must not say, "I will go home, and eat and drink, and my soul will be at peace." A person must share in the concerns of the community as Moses did. Those who share in the community's troubles are worthy to see its consolation. – Talmud, Ta'anit

About Life

Dear Ella,

Janice and I have been friends for as long as I can remember. She is a wonderful person with a heart of gold.

Though she is very bubbly and loves to talk, unfortunately, she also has a big mouth. She repeats almost any and all secrets. She gossips and doesn't even realize she is doing it. It is almost like she can't help herself.

Last week, when she was over at the house, she overheard a phone conversation I was having. I didn't think in my wildest dreams that she would repeat the information she heard, but she did. I was devastated. I never thought she would breach my confidence. I was very hurt and told her so but she dismissed the whole conversation and said I was making too much of the incident. I don't want to have to watch everything I say around her. What do I do?

Gossip Gloom

Dear Gossip Gloom,

It's very sad that Janice has hurt you. She has betrayed your confidence and lost your trust.

It seems Janice has no idea how damaging gossip can be. It may be fun for her at the time because she may get a rise from the person she is gossiping to, but think of what happens when the deed is done. It begins to spread like a disease. It is painful and there are no pills to help. It is verbal violence, and by the time the victim has realized the attack, the damage is done and there is seldom a cure.

Gossip hurts. It is designed that way. An innocent story snowballs and becomes a spreading rumour and often ends up as a vicious lie that damages the reputation of others who have no chance to defend themselves.

Janice has to stop. She is not doing herself any favours by gossiping and it serves no constructive purpose. Explain to her you can't speak freely around her anymore. Give her examples and be firm. She can't be a good friend to you if you can't confide in her. Gossip has been known to ruin relationships and I hope yours can overcome this nasty disease. Janice needs to realize she has a problem and want to fix it.

German pensions extended

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

Canada and Germany were set to sign a treaty earlier this week that will give eastern European Jews of German ancestry the right to German government pensions.

The agreement, which will not be implemented until early 2003, will likely affect only a handful of Jews living in Canada, but it will right a wrong that has seen similarly situated Jews in Israel and the United States receive German pensions, say community officials who pushed for its adoption.

> 'Moral issue that transcends numbers'

"We know this agreement will only benefit a few people in this country," said Canadian Jewish Congress president Keith Landy. "But for us this is a moral issue that transcends numbers."

The Supplementary Pension Agreement was to be signed Tuesday in Toronto by Jane Stewart, minister of Human Resources and Development Canada, and German Ambassador to Canada Christian Pauls. Under the agreement, Germany will pay pensions to people who were driven out of their homelands in eastern Europe in the 1930s and 1940s.

Following World War II, Germany agreed to pay pensions to ethnic Germans who had been forced from their homes and to include their time in their previous homelands in pension calculations. To qualify, applicants had to be ethnic Germans and residing in Germany.

The News in Brief

CANADA

Advisory Renewed

OTTAWA — The Department of Foreign Affairs and International Trade earlier this month reissued a travel report advising Canadians to defer all tourist travel to Israel "due to the risk of terrorist activity." In March, the department upgraded its advisory to its current level from a previous warning to Canadians to consider deferring tourist travel. A spokesperson said the situation in Israel since March "hasn't improved, so the level of advice hasn't changed." The department advises Canadians in Israel "to avoid crowded places and not use public surface transport."

ISRAEL

Shoes Make Aliyah

JERUSALEM — Israeli Chief Rabbi Meir Lau and cabinet minister Danny Naveh were among those welcoming U.S. shoemaker Florsheim Shoes at the opening of its first Israeli outlet in Jerusalem's Center One mall earlier this month. "It is important... to recognize those companies who, despite the situation, continue to believe in the strength of our economy and the spirit of our people," Naveh said at the opening.

Immigration Worries

JERUSALEM — Some two-thirds of immigrants who have arrived in Israel from the former Soviet Union (FSU) this year are not Jewish, according to figures released last week by the Interior Ministry. From January 2002 to July 2002, 9,367 immigrants arrived from the FSU, of whom 5,508 were non-Jews. From 1989 until 2002, 859,502 immigrants arrived from the FSU, of whom 239,682 were not Jewish. Interior Minister Eli Yishai said the figures point to the need for an immediate change to the Law of Return, or else "by the end of 2010, the State of Israel will lose its Jewish identity."

Egged to Sue Arafat

JERUSALEM — Egged, Israel's national bus company, plans to sue Palestinian Authority President Yasser Arafat for damages from bombing attacks. An Egged official said last week the company has lost $86 million (US) since the latest intifadah began in September 2000. More than 100 passengers have been killed and 600 wounded in attacks on its buses since then, Egged said.

Human Shield Ruling

JERUSALEM — Israel's High Court issued a temporary injunction last week barring the army from using "human shields" to tell terrorists to come out of hiding. The court gave the army one week to explain the tactic. The court was responding to petitions filed by human rights groups protesting the practice of sending a Palestinian into a building where a suspect is believed to be hiding to relay a surrender request. A petition was filed after an incident in the West Bank in which a 19-year-old Palestinian was allegedly forced to summon a wanted Hamas member, who was killed by gunfire.

WORLD

Agunah Get Day

NEW YORK — The Brooklyn based group L'Maan Bnos Yisrael International, which helps agunot and their children, is holding its fourth annual Agunah Get Day on Sept. 10. "Jews all over the world are challenged to encourage recalcitrant husbands to do tshuvah and give their agunah wives a get before Yom Kippur." The group is also encouraging Jews worldwide to pray for agunot on Erev Rosh Hashanah.

Supremacists Rally

WASHINGTON, D.C. — The neo-Nazi National Alliance was scheduled to hold a large demonstration and a "Rock Against Israel" white power music concert this past Saturday outside the U.S. Capitol. Hundreds were expected to attend, and a counter-demonstration by anti-racist skinheads and others was also planned. The National Alliance has staged several anti-Semitic demonstrations outside the Israeli Embassy in the past year.

Supremacists Shunned

BERLIN — Fewer young Germans are joining neo-Nazi groups, says an expert on the subject. The decrease in support comes as young Germans are showing decreased interest in politics generally, says Klaus Hurrelman, who conducted a recent survey of 2,500 Germans aged 12 to 25.

Comic book character 'The Thing' is Jewish

NEW YORK — A famous Marvel Comics superhero has finally revealed his Jewish roots.

In a recent issue of the Fantastic Four comic book series, Benjamin "The Thing" Grimm returned to his Lower East Side neighbourhood in New York City to return a Jewish Star he stole from a Jewish shopkeeper.

After The Thing recites the Shema, the shopkeeper asks him whether he had been ashamed of his Jewishness all these years.

"I don't talk it up, is all," The Thing replies. "Figure there's enough trouble in this world without people thinkin' Jews are all monsters like me."

Marvel founder Stan Lee and the other creators of the character, who themselves are Jewish, made The Thing Jewish when they created him in 1961, a Marvel Comics spokesperson said.

In the final panels of the comic book, a villain tells The Thing, who is orange and rock-like, that he doesn't look Jewish.

Israel Mall draws thousands of shoppers

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

For hours people lined up in the hot summer sun, standing in a queue four or five across that snaked its way from the doorway of a north Toronto plaza for a couple of hundred metres all the way to Finch Avenue.

On Finch, latecomers found themselves in traffic jams resembling a mid-week rush hour, while early birds waited patiently to enter the 7,000-square-foot premises of the former Seneca College campus and purchase made-in-Israel items from visiting Israeli merchants.

Altogether, 10,000 Torontonians are believed to have filed into the Israel Mall on opening day on Sunday last week, with thousands more visiting the temporary shopping site on subsequent days.

The Israel Mall, one of a dozen similar Israeli shopping experiences set up in North American cities this summer, was, by any measure, a success. Thousands plunked down hard cash to purchase Israeli-made merchandise – much of which was not otherwise available in Toronto – while cash-strapped Israeli vendors racked up sales to help keep their businesses afloat.

The mall nourished both body and soul, organizers suggested. Besides helping Israeli businesses experiencing financial difficulties, it provided relief to Canadian Jews who are concerned about the welfare of ordinary Israelis and looking for a way to come to their aid.

Above: People lined up to get into the Israel Mall on opening day and then checked out the merchandise. Left: Benjamin Lax shows off his new kippah. [Jacob El-Baz photos]

The Israeli economy has been hit hard by the Palestinian uprising, now nearing the end of its second year. Tourist traffic has dried up and even Israelis are staying home, afraid to venture out to crowded markets and to spend money in uncertain economic times.

The inevitable results have been layoffs, business closures and scaled-back activities.

Izzy Kaplan is a frequent visitor to Israel. As owner of Israel's Judaica Centre, he travels there often on buying trips. In the last six months, he's seen the mood among merchants deteriorate.

"It's sickening to watch people with healthy businesses get depressed. People are not even coming in to say hello anymore."

As a self-described "do-er," Kaplan decided to take action. He had heard of Israel Fairs in some U.S. cities and decided if Canadians are no longer travelling to Israel as they once did, Israeli merchants should bring their wares to Canadians.

For the past few months, Kaplan has been pulling the project together, helped by a small cadre of volunteers led by Eli Poch. Eventually the Toronto Zionist Council, UJA Federation and B'nai Brith Canada came on board.

The response in Israel was also positive. "There was a lot of interest and a lot of people wanted to come," Kaplan said. "Before we knew it, we had something going."

In the end, some 25 Israeli merchants shipped their wares to Toronto. Another 30 or more were eager to participate but couldn't be accommodated.

Welcome Sephardi music

From the editor's desk

King David was described as the "sweet singer of Israel." He was not, of course, the first of Israel's singers, only the most famous of the "early" ones.

The first recorded song in the Bible, no pun intended, was the exultant, cathartic Song of the Sea, led by Moses' sister, Miriam, a celebration of God's miracle in the splitting of the Sea of Reeds.

Song, melody and harmony are part of the deep structure of Jewish prayer and soulfulness. They are also a faithful chamber of Jewish history, in which the myriad echoes of diverse Jewish experience, wherever lived, glorious and melancholy, reverberate for succeeding generations to hear and from which to be moved and to learn.

It is thus too important a development not to mention the imminent arrival of three new additions to the growing corpus of recorded music of the Sephardi tradition.

The debut album of The Sons of Sepharad is about to be released. The "sons" are Aaron Bensoussan, Gerard Edery and Albert Mizrahi. Along with oudist George Mgrdichian, percussionist Rex Benincasa and clarinetist Francois Houle, they comprise one of the most exciting new groups and stylists of Jewish music.

Born in Morocco, Bensoussan, the cantor of Beth Emeth Bais Yehuda synagogue in Toronto, has a lyrical tenor voice that often soars enthusiastically and evocatively to emotional heights.

Edery, also Moroccan, is the vocal anchor of the trio. His classically trained baritone voice provides the weighty ballast to the harmonies.

And Mizrahi, born in Greece, brings to the group a lusty tenor voice of great power and sensitivity.

Together, the three "sons" entertain and inspire with an history-tugging repertoire that encompasses Ladino, Greek, Turkish, Arabic, Hebrew and even English renditions of age-old, traditional melodies and the occasional modern creation.

In good "ecumenical" and "cross-cultural" example, the group will be featured in Toronto at the upcoming Ashkenaz Festival of New Yiddish Culture on Sept. 2, at 235 Queens Quay West.

The renowned teacher, composer, chazzan, musician and researcher Solly Levy is co-ordinating the production of a three-volume anthology of northern Morroccan liturgy. The first volume, entitled The Yamim Noraim Cantata, was released this week just ahead of this year's Yamim Noraim.

Collaborating with Levy on the second and third volumes is singer/songwriter, teacher and ethnomusicologist Judith Cohen.

Levy's project is an ambitious effort to document not only music and liturgy, but the heritage of an entire distinct culture of the Jews who once inhabited northern Morocco. He undertook the project in honour of the late father of the chief rabbi of the Sephardi Rabbinate of Ontario, Rabbi Amram Assayag, who passed away two years ago and was one of the few individuals of his generation in this part of the world who retained personal knowledge of the countless colourful melodies that comprised the rich fabric of devout Jewish life in Morocco.

As the many Diaspora Jewish traditions lose their distinctiveness and meld at the edges, if not also at the cores, into a melange of integrated, modern Jewish culture, the Levy project assumes even greater importance.

The Yamim Noraim Cantata is available through the Sephardi Educational Foundation of Canada. Call 905-669-7654, ext. 247.

The Jewish community of Italy in the 15th-17th centuries was not Sephardi, though it included Sephardi Jews. There was, however, a vibrant Jewish community there at the time. Some were known as Italkim, or Italian Jews, many of whom could trace their lineage to the Jews who settled in Rome during the Hasmonean rule of Eretz Yisrael, or who arrived as slaves in the second century AD. Jews also settled in Italy after the expulsions from Spain and Portugal and as a result of migrations from central and eastern Europe and from the Levant further east.

Lady Take a Lover Now, produced by Benjamin Wolff of Endpin Records, is an innovative, ambitious undertaking that reproduces a sampling of the music and poetry of the Jews of the ghettos of Italy during the period of the Renaissance. It features the music and poetry of the most famous artists of the Jewish community of that time: Salamone Rossi, Leone de Modena, Joseph Tzarfati, Jacob Frances, Moshe ben Joab and Immanuel of Rome.

The CD's title is taken from the last line of the first poem recited on it, Octavas to Felicia, by Joseph Tzarfati, the talented 16th-century physician, philosopher and mathematician.

The publicists describe the CD as a "time capsule in sound, revealing the words and melodies of a Jewish community living in a vibrant culture and unparalleled age." It is an apt description.

Israeli journalist outlines a nightmare scenario

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

In Israel's nightmare scenario, events unfold something like this: The United States launches its long-anticipated war in Iraq to unseat Saddam Hussein. Saddam reacts by firing Scud missiles against Israeli population centres, but unlike during the 1991 Gulf War, this time they are armed with chemical or biological warheads.

At the same time, a Palestinian suicide bomber straps explosives to his waist. Like dozens of aspiring "shaheeds" (Islamic martyrs) before him, he finds a densely populated civilian target and detonates the bomb. But instead of merely strewing deadly shards of metal and iron bolts in all directions, this time the explosives spread chemical or biological agents, supplied by Iraq. The result is a health catastrophe.

Unable to withstand that level of attack, Israel retaliates with nuclear weapons – just as it has threatened to do in recent weeks. Iraq is devastated.

Bad enough to be sure, but things could get worse.

On Israel's northern border, Syria opens a second front. Hezbollah, armed with a variety of missiles able to reach as far as Haifa, launches a barrage against population centres. Israel retaliates, and a regional war is ignited.

Dan Diker has been observing the Israeli scene quite closely and believes Israeli military strategists are planning for just such eventualities.

A correspondent and analyst for Channel 1 News on Israeli television as well as a columnist and Internet radio host (on www.jpost radio.com), Diker said his contacts in the military and intelligence establishment tell him Iran and Syria are co-operating to arm Hezbollah with chemical weapons.

Given the 150 missile warheads that can reach as far as Haifa and the 8,500 warheads, including Katyushas, that Hezbollah has in its arsenal, the chance of a wider war is quite real, he said.

Dan Diker

Israel, he continued, is not without defences. Israeli experts believe their Arrow anti-missile system can intercept Iraqi warheads in mid-flight. As well, concern over a massive Israeli retaliation could well deter Syria from embarking on a military adventure. And a Palestinian "mega-attack," long anticipated by Israeli security forces, has not yet occurred.

But Diker said Iraq is certainly involved in arming Palestinian terrorists.

"The relationship of Iraq to the Palestinian Authority is very clear. [Saddam] is the father saint of suicide bombers," he said, adding that Palestinians danced on rooftops during the Gulf War when Iraq hit Israel with Scud missiles.

Diker, who was in Toronto recently as a guest of UJA Federation, said if Israel experiences a nightmare scenario, the regional status quo will likely not hold.

"There is the possibility of a population shift, like in 1948. If the Palestinian Authority proves to be involved [in a mega-attack], it's possible hundreds if not thousands of people will be deported," he said.

"Israeli society is at the end of its rope," he continued. It has experienced an unprecedented wave of terrorist attacks. Eight hundred and sixty people have been killed and more than 5,000 wounded since the Oslo agreement was signed in 1993, more than all the terror victims in the 35 years prior to Oslo, he said.

Putting that number in perspective, Diker said it would be as if 48,000 Americans had been killed in the last nine years.

Diker, who addressed a variety of audiences during his brief Toronto visit, said the U.S.-Israeli relationship is as strong as it's ever been. Part of that is due to the fact U.S. President George W. Bush is a deeply devout Christian and draws important support from a strongly pro-Israel Christian constituency.

In addition, he said, an influential "Republican Jewish leadership" is emerging, paralleling a dramatic shift in the U.S. Jewish community away from the Democratic Party to the Republicans.

Much of that shift has occurred since Sept. 11, when many Jewish community leaders recognized "the failure of the Clinton administration to address militant Islam."

Based on his discussions in Canada, Diker believes Canadian Jews have likewise come to the "absolute understanding that Oslo was a catastrophic failure."

Since Oslo was the brainchild of "hard-core left-wing ideologues," such as Yossi Beilin and Shimon Peres, Israel's Labour Party has suffered a dramatic loss of support, he said.

Meanwhile, Diker's political sources in Likud tell him that if Shas leaves the current coalition government over fiscal cuts to its pet projects, Israel could see elections as soon as January. His sources in Labour tell him that party could leave the coalition by November.

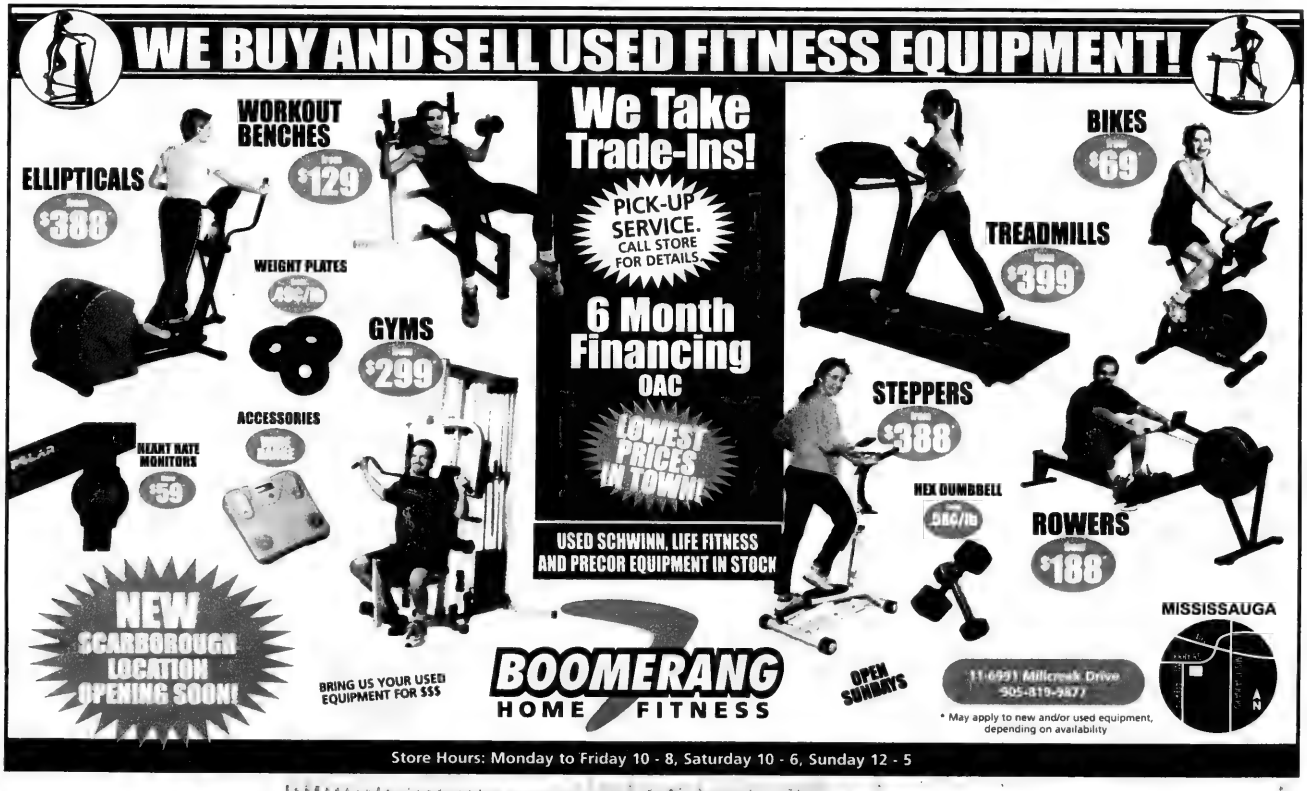
Turning to what he calls "the new media warfare," Diker said the Palestinian political class has become adept at manipulating the media.

"They have made a strategic decision to use the media in their own society to glorify children blowing themselves up in the name of God… and that has become a TV event."

The result is one society mobilizing to destroy a neighbour's civil society.

Diker rejected suggestions suicide killers are driven by frustration over their socio-economic conditions. On the contrary, he said, suicide bombers are largely drawn from middle class families and are well educated and multi-lingual, just like the Sept. 11 terrorists.

They turn into human bombs for the "glorification of being a shaheed."



Ashkenaz returns to Harbourfront with a klapp

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

The Ashkenaz Festival of New Yiddish Culture is back.

After a three-year hiatus, it returns to Harbourfront on Aug. 31 for a three-day extravaganza of music, dance, film, theatre, storytelling, visual arts, literature and lectures.

Advertised as the world's largest festival of its kind, the fourth Ashkenaz Festival, presented by the Miles Nadal Jewish Community Centre, is inspired by the wisdom of the past and the creativity of the present.

Most of the performances will be free.

More than 70,000 people attended the last Ashkenaz in 1999.

This year's festival, which is funded by private and public organizations as well as various levels of government, is expected to draw more people than ever before, said artistic director Mitchell Leonard Smolkin.

Although the upcoming edition will be shorter by five days, "it will be just as intense artistically," he promised.

Smolkin said the festival will offer "the most unique and comprehensive look at contemporary Yiddish and Jewish culture in Canada and North America."

The acts include Di Naye Kapelye, a klezmer band from Hungary; Letter to My Father, a play by Alon Nashman about Czech novelist Franz Kafka, and a series of dance pieces by choreographer Allen Kaeja.

The lineup of performers:

Adrienne Cooper, a Yiddish vocalist, has 20 recordings to her credit, including Partisans of Vilna, the only Yiddish song ever nominated for a Grammy.

Anthony Coleman, a pianist, straddles the divide between heavy jazz and soulful klezmer.

The Cracow Klezmer Band from Poland blends traditional Jewish and Balkan music with contemporary jazz.

David Krakauer, a clarinetist, is a major klezmer musician.

Yale Strom, a filmmaker, writer and violinist, presents a movie – The Last Klezmer – and reads from his latest book.

Josh Dolgin, an accordionist and pianist, merges the rhythms of hip-hop with traditional Jewish music to create a post-modern style of klezmer.

Khevrisa – the Old Jewish Klezmer Ensemble – swings to the beat of a fiddle, kontra fiddle, cymbal and bass.

Klezmer En Buenos Aires combines elements of Argentine folk music, jazz, contemporary music and tango.

Susan Sandler and Elaine Hoffman Watts form a mother-daughter klezmer band.

Mitchell Leonard Smolkin

Klezperanto's repertoire blends zydeco, rockabilly, New Orleans funk, samba, Yiddish tunes and jazz standards.

Kurt Bjorling, the lead clarinet in the Chicago Klezmer Ensemble, reaches back to klezmer traditions.

The Songs of Sepharad features Aaron Bensoussan, Gerard Edery and Alberto Mizrahi and draws on Ladino, Greek, Turkish, Arabic and Hebrew melodies.

Zalmen Mlotek, an authority on Yiddish folk and theatre music, appears in Yiddishland, an exploration of Yiddish music.

Beyond the Pale, a Toronto-based klezmer band, released the CD Routes, which was nominated for a Canadian Independent Music Award as world album of the year in 2001.

Finjan, a classical/klezmer ensemble from Winnipeg, marks its 20th anniversary this year.

Flying Bulgar Klezmer Band, established by David Buchbinder in 1987, has four CDs to its credit, notably Tsirkus and Fire.

From Both Ends of the Earth mixes traditional Yiddish and Ukrainian genres.

Judith Cohen, an authority on Sephardi music, performs on bowed vielle, 'ud and dulcimer.

Mitchell Leonard Smolkin, Ashkenaz's artistic director, presents an array of Yiddish music from early Yiddish theatre in New York City.

Toronto Jewish Folk Choir draws on composers who reflect the spirit of the modern Jew.

Theresa Tova, a Canadian actress and playwright, starred in the Stratford Festival production of Fiddler on the Roof and in the Lincoln Center's An Evening of Yiddish Divas.

Dos Naye Lid, by composer Milton Barnes, is a piece of music in five parts.

Jewish Luck, a 1925 classic of Soviet silent film, is based on a Shalom Aleichem story and stars Yiddish State Art Theatre actor Solomon Mikhoels.

Alter explores the Diaspora through film, slide projection and live sound.

The Trials of John Demjanjuk, a play by Jonathan Garfinkel, probes the nature of guilt and retribution.

The White Challah, by Lamed Shapiro, is about a Christian soldier and the trials he endures.

Seder, written and directed by Rebecca Brown, is an epic musical that uses Exodus as a thematic setting.

2001: A Space Mishegas, by Joanne Borts, Michael Fox and Zalmen Mlotek, is geared to kids.

Anna Shternshis, a professor of Yiddish and Yiddish literature at the University of Toronto, delivers a lecture on Yiddish folksongs in the Soviet Union during the 1930s.

Sylwia Szymanska, a professor of Yiddish language at the University of Warsaw, gives a lecture on Poland and the Holocaust.

Chava Rosenfarb, a poet, playwright and novelist, lectures on Yiddish literature.

This year's Ashkenaz parade, created by Shadowland Theatre and Ashkenaz artists, will be led by David Buchbinder and Toronto's Samba Squad.

"The parade will encompass pageant elements – static plots and driven segments – and will circle Harbourfront," said Smolkin.

Back to school

Irrespective of era, place or generation, talmud Torah, studying Torah, was always one of the highest community priorities. Indeed, following the destruction of the Temple, when Jews were forced to contend with life in exile, compulsory education of our children was introduced by the wise leaders of the community.

Over time and the millennia of Jewish existence and custom, the importance of talmud Torah, inculcated into the Jewish soul and psyche from the earliest days of our peoplehood, evolved into a wide reverence for learning and studying in general. Whether it was for its own sake, or for the sake of doing good deeds, the pursuit and advancement of knowledge – studying, learning – were always accorded great deference and respect in the Jewish world.

Learning at any age and at all ages was encouraged. But there was always a keen recognition that the most meaningful learning occurred during the younger ages. Thus, Abayé, the ancient sage of mishnaic times, said: "The lessons of youth are not easily forgotten." And about a thousand years later, the Andalusian scholar Ibn Gvirol, colourfully expanded on Abayé's dictum: "Learning in old age is like writing on sand; learning in youth is like engraving on stone."

Next week, our youngsters bring out their chisels and hammers and once again start engraving new lessons into the stone of their lifelong learning. School is back.

But it is not only to wish our children well in the academic year ahead that these words are written, though that is also our purpose. Rather, it is to remind the older generation – we, their parents, grandparents, uncles and aunts – that the challenges our children face are many, whether in elementary, middle, secondary or post-secondary school, and that with our support, their chances of success improve immeasurably. That support, of course, must be multi-faceted: material, emotional, communal, individual, comprehensive and unstinting.

But it is in relation to one challenge in particular that we write today: the anti-Israel, sometimes even anti-Semitic, atmosphere that some of our children face on campus.

Reports have already surfaced about potential problems. At the University of Toronto, the Arts & Science Student Union dedicated its annual Anti-Calendar this year to murdered "innocents" in Afghanistan and Palestine. At Concordia University, the administration has been asked by B'nai Brith to investigate the abuse of the university's own Internet server by the Student Association for Muslim Awareness, which is allegedly posting Holocaust denial and pro-jihadist Web sites on the university's network.

With the conflict between Israel and the Palestinian Authority still roiling, with the Allied Forces still patrolling the desert and mountain ranges of Afghanistan, with the anticipation of a strike against Saddam Hussein increasing each week, there is every reason to expect another year of vile, anti-Israel agitation and propaganda on campus.

As a community and as parents, we must therefore ensure that our children have adequate resources and back-up – human, educational and financial – to respond to whatever storms may lie ahead.

Remember Iranian prisoners

The article by Marlene Fine, "A Visit to Iran" (CJN, Aug. 8), tweaked my memory about the plight of the arrest and conviction of Iranian Jews in 1999 on trumped-up charges of spying for Israel.

At the foot of your editorial every week, you remind us of these prisoners and list their names under the plaintive headline, "Let Our People Go." I recall a well-attended rally in front of Toronto's old city hall urging participants to never forget the prisoners and remain active in calling for their release. I have written to the Iranian ambassador to Canada, but predictably, I did not receive a response. Our own foreign minister told me that Canada was monitoring the situation carefully. It will be recalled that the trials were held in secret and the accused parties were not given the choice of counsel. I urge your readers en masse to write to the Canadian foreign minister demanding the release of these wrongly imprisoned Iranian Jews.

The power of hope

After spending five weeks in Israel, I believe it is essential that Jews throughout the world visit the Jewish State for a number of reasons: to boost its economy, to show our family there that they are not alone, and to be present at this very critical moment in Jewish history. I venture to add another equally important reason: to learn about the power of hope.

I met many extraordinary people during my stay: people like Sherri Mandell, whose son, Kobi, was killed by terrorists in May 2001. She and her husband, Seth, have recently initiated the Koby Mandell Foundation's Healing Retreat, a therapeutic program for bereaved mothers and widows of families struck by terror. I met her on the day after the opening of her special summer camp, Camp Koby, for children who have lost siblings to terrorism. She told me that it was a "beautiful thing to see." I was just amazed that she and her family had the strength to give others hope.

Just by interacting with people on the street in Israel today, one can learn from these ordinary heroes the true meaning of courage in the face of adversity. This, in turn, can give us, Jews living in the Diaspora, more strength and pride. The people whom I met, both young and old, veterans and new olim, were obviously concerned about the situation, but were determined and deeply committed to Israel. They inspired me greatly.

Can we deepen our humanity?

Some 78 years ago, in 1924, Hebrew University president J. L. Magnas was quoted as saying: "The purpose of the Hebrew University is not our assimilation among the peoples, but the absorption into Judaism of mankind's spiritual treasures, in so far as the law of the Jewish soul permits this. We want to look out upon humanity through our own eyes, unblended by a civilization that seems doomed to destruction by reason of its bondage to machinery. True to ourselves, we want to absorb and work over in our own way what humanity has to give us. We want the Jewish spiritual view of life to be deepened and broadened, so that it may help broaden and deepen the spiritual life of humanity."

After the recent bombing there, I wonder how much more humanity we have to take.

If consulate closes

If the Israeli consulate closes, the "Jewish alliance" against the occupation will be in a quandary. They will have to decide where they will hold their shameful and downright disgusting weekly spectacles that denigrate Israel.

May I suggest a few alternative locations. How about in front of the Cavendish Mall in Cote St. Luc, or maybe the Satmar yeshiva where at least they can be among friends and supporters. Better yet, why not in a Jewish cemetery – a most fitting place to demonstrate, for if, God forbid, their dastardly ideas ever came to fruition, that's where most or all of Israel's Jews would end up.

Blame on both sides

If only things were so simple! In "The Mythology of Jerusalem and Oslo's Failure" (CJN, July 25), Gerald Steinberg lays blame for the present situation on Palestinian Authority President Yasser Arafat's failure to acknowledge the Jewish history of Jerusalem. Steinberg claims that once the Jewish connection to Jerusalem has been accepted, "the rest will be easy."

While the issue of Jerusalem cannot be overlooked, its resolution will not provide an end to the conflict. An end to the conflict will arise only when two secure states with defined and recognized borders have been established. To place so much of the blame on the issue of Jerusalem is to be dangerously naive.

The Israeli occupation, and recent re-occupation, is not alone responsible for the misery facing the Palestinian people. The corruption among Arafat and his cohorts is equally to blame. Yet in his attempt to destroy the "Palestinian terrorist infrastructure," Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon is also destroying legitimate Palestinian bodies with whom he should be working to create a new Palestinian leadership. There is no easy solution. But to pinpoint Jerusalem as the cause, and therefore the solution, allows us to ignore the reality of the situation and to absolve "our side" of any responsibility.

A simple and clear agenda for the new year

By GIL TROY

Our sages teach us that on Rosh Hashanah we celebrate the creation of the world. We dip apples in honey to symbolize both hope and thanksgiving – hope for good tidings in the coming year and thanksgiving for the wonders of the world, the blessings of creation.

This Rosh Hashanah, even as we continue to celebrate, as Jews have done throughout the ages no matter how bleak the times, we will also mark three more recent, and more sobering, anniversaries. We, along with the rest of the civilized world, will prepare to observe the first anniversary of the Sept. 11 massacres, the mass murders of thousands of innocent commuters and secretaries, computer programmers and stock brokers, in New York, Pennsylvania and Washington, D.C.

We also will have just finished marking the first anniversary of the Durban debacle, last August's United Nations conference in South Africa that was supposed to be a forum against racism, but which degenerated into an orgy of anti-Semitism.

And we will prepare to observe the second anniversary of the launching of the Palestinian jihad against Israel, the deliberate decision made by Palestinian Authority President Yasser Arafat and his followers to turn away from negotiations and toward violence, a strategy that has brought great misery to Jews and Palestinians.

Tragically, these three anniversaries are interrelated. They are three manifestations of a hydra-headed monster that threatens the civilized world. Even as we acknowledge that no one in the West, Israel, the United States or even Canada, is perfect, for we are all human; and even as we recognize that all religions, including Islam, can be forces for good, we must identify the evil force of Islamism behind all three modern tragedies: the emergence of catastrophic terrorism, the resurgence of anti-Semitism, and the reversion of so many Palestinians to the crudest of methods in the Arab world's decades-long effort to destroy Israel.

It remains shocking that certain self-evident truths need to be explained again and again – that suicide bombings and other such attempts to advance political goals by targeting innocent civilians are unacceptable and must be rejected, no matter what the cause; that without that X factor – the extremist and reactionary Islamist movement – Al Qaeda and the Taliban, Hezbollah and Hamas would not have destroyed the lives of thousands of innocents over the last few years; that it is no coincidence that one of the principal Palestinian terrorist groups is called "Islamic Jihad," or that Palestinian Christians have not turned themselves into walking weapons of mass destruction – no matter how enraged they might be with Israeli policies.

This Rosh Hashanah, we must dedicate ourselves to speaking the truth, to separating legitimate political concerns from immoral terrorist methods. We must, at the start of this school year, consecrate our lives to learning the facts, to mastering the complexities, so that we can see this crazy world clearly and share our understandings with our friends and colleagues.

But in addition to learning, we need to act. We as Canadian Jews need to be purposeful, aggressive, and strategic. We need to develop an action agenda that is both effective and realistic. Hand-wringing is not enough. We have had more wake-up calls than any of us should need. All of us, young and old, rich and poor, insiders and outsiders, should unite around the following simple and clear agenda items:

• The Canadian government must revise its "list of terrorist entities" to include all branches and wings of Hamas, Islamic Jihad and Hezbollah.

Canadian Jews have been remarkably ineffectual in influencing the Chrétien government's Middle East policy. This is partially due to the excessive timidity of the Canadian Jewish community and partially due to the paradoxical, contradictory, herky-jerky, one-day-left, one-day-right mishmash that masquerades as the Chrétien government's policy on the Middle East. Amid this confusion, one thing is clear: If the government cannot even identify Hamas, Islamic Jihad, and Hezbollah as terrorist entities, despite these groups' avowed commitments to suicide bombings, let alone their professed desire to destroy the Jewish State, the government cannot honestly claim to be fighting terrorism or supporting Israel.

Focusing on this one issue, in all interactions with the Chrétien government, should make it clear that we are not fooled and that we will not be passive in the face of an outrageous deviation from the government's claim to be serious about disrupting the worldwide network of terrorism that both abuses and threatens the freedoms we enjoy in this country.

• The Canadian government should use its standing as an honest broker to push for a resolution of the Israeli hostage issue.

On Oct. 7, we will celebrate another sober anniversary: Hezbollah's kidnapping of three young Israeli soldiers on the supposedly peaceful, and UN-supervised Lebanese border. Shortly thereafter, a fourth Israeli was apparently lured to Beirut and kidnapped as well.

For almost two years, these four families – the Avrahams, the Avitans, the Souads, and the Tenenbaums – have endured the most painful of purgatories, caught in a web of rumours, clues, half-truths, and lies. There are four other families of Israeli MiAs that have endured these tortures for over a decade – the Arads, the Baumels, the Katzes and the Feldmans.

It is hard for good people to conceive of entities such as Hezbollah that embrace cruelty as a strategy. Even if Canadian diplomats do not succeed in freeing any hostages, even if none are still alive, the simple act of raising the issue will send a message to these tortured families that they are not alone in their quest for justice, that their beloved sons are not forgotten.

• The victims of terrorism should not be forgotten.

The last two years of bombings and shootings has devastated so many individuals, families and friendship circles. We need to act, as individuals, as families, as organizations, to adopt the families of victims, or adopt recovering victims themselves. We must bomb these Israelis with love, with donations, with art work from our children, with cards, with caring, with visits – if they are inclined to receive visitors.

Each of us, either individually or as part of some functional collective, should adopt one of the unfortunates whose great crime was being in the wrong place at the wrong time, and we should do what we can for their survivors, or for them, depending on what happened when the bomb went off, the bullet flew, the mortar shell landed.

• There must be zero tolerance for anti-Semitism (as well as all forms of racism and bigotry).

This Rosh Hashanah, as we contemplate the guards in our shuls and the guards in our schools, we must turn to our neighbours and tell them: "This is not acceptable!" Our community has been threatened and we need help from fellow Christians and Muslims, from citizens and government officials. All must stand with us and be vigilant.

Imagine how powerful a statement would be made if rather than being forced to strain limited Jewish community budgets to hire security guards, we were overwhelmed by citizen patrols from mosques and from churches, from fire departments and corporations, all committed to making sure that the promise of freedom of worship and of association for all truly was fulfilled throughout this great nation.

Imagine how confusing it might be for our enemies if they knew that in contemplating Jewish targets, non-Jews would be there as well. And imagine how bonding it would be if we were to respond to such an act of friendship by reciprocating, standing by mosques and churches where Muslims or Christians might feel threatened, or figuring out another way to strike a blow against bigotry.

These four agenda items must, of course, be part of a broader effort to deepen, intensify, and actualize our support for Israel in her time of need. And while reacting, defending and responding, we must also do what we can to build, develop and envision a new and mutual friendship with Israel. Just because we are under attack does not mean that we can stop attacking other problems in our community – we must in fact redouble our efforts to renew, rebuild and transform Judaism, and to make this year not only a year of community solidarity but of communal renewal.

With our efforts, perhaps next year our prayers of hope and thanksgiving will lack this year's melancholy tinge. And regardless of what happens, if we rise to the challenges of today, at least each of us will know that somehow, in some way, despite the many troubles, we helped make things a little better, if not for the world, at least for some of its victims.

Gil Troy is professor of history at McGill University. His latest book, Why I Am A Zionist: Israel, Jewish Identity and the Challenges of Today, has just been released in a second printing.

A Palestinian people?

Rabbi Gunther Plaut in Toronto

About a generation ago, Golda Meir, the former prime minister of Israel, made a statement that earned her derision and many enemies. She said: "There is no such thing as a Palestinian people."

She meant that there was no distinct Palestinian cultural or national identity.

Her remarks were well publicized. But what is less well-known is that way back in 1977, a member of the Palestine Liberation Organization said: "The Palestinian people does not exist. The creation of a Palestinian state is only a means for continuing our struggle against the State of Israel for our Arab unity."

Which is to say that the idea of a "Palestinian people" is a creation of public relations and not a historical fact.

We Jews ought to know that fiction of this kind often plays an important political role. After all, for centuries Jews have been the target of oodles of ascriptions, most of them propaganda and outright fiction, depicting us as devils incarnate or simply casting us in a negative light.

Other fiction may be somewhat less harmful, but it is still fiction. Thus, it ought to be repeated that there is really no difference between Jordanians, Palestinians, Syrians and Lebanese. Only for political and tactical reasons do people – that is, mainly Arabs – speak today about the existence of a Palestinian people, since Arab national interests demand that they posit the existence of a distinct "Palestinian people" to oppose Zionism.

In a recent article, U.S. journalist Joseph Farah, a Christian Arab, had this to say: "Golda Meir was right. Her statement is validated by the truth of history and by the candid, but not widely circulated pronouncements of [Palestinian Authority President Yasser] Arafat and his lieutenants. Israel and the West must not surrender to terrorism by granting the killers just what they want – a public relations triumph and a strategic victory. It's not too late to say 'no' to terrorism. It's not too late to say 'no' to another Arab terror state. It's not too late to tell the truth about Palestine."

Again, this is a statement by a Christian Arab.

I suggest that we give this fact wide publicity. My readers can start with a mouth-to-mouth campaign: just talk about it when an opportunity presents itself – after all, that is what I am doing with this column.

Keeping silent on this issue is not helpful to the cause of truth, which is and must be our firm harness.

What I did on my summer vacation

I am a fortunate person. Over the years I have been privileged to travel to many places, to countries and cities I never thought I would see when I was a girl growing up in Bethlehem, Pa. And in every place, I have sought to see how the Jews of that city or country live – or, if they were no longer there, how they had lived their lives.

Jean M. Gerber in Vancouver

Many of these communities were in the twilight of their existence. In Isfahan, Iran, the community seemed to be living on borrowed time, the synagogue actually located below street level. Who knows what has happened to its members? In Prague, the synagogues are beautifully restored but haunted by ghosts and visited only by tourists. Baghdad, Diyarbakir (in Turkey) and so many other ancient communities are now long dispersed.

So it is with delight that one travels in North America, where communities flourish, despite the gloom of those who predict the end of the Jewish people.

I found my recent trip to Toronto a totally uplifting experience. Here is a community bursting with Jewish life in all its multiplicity. We were blessed with an invitation to a wedding of two wonderful young people at a vibrant Orthodox congregation. We davened in a Reform synagogue that has opened its doors to the homeless, giving them shelter for the night. We toured the (Conservative) Beth Tzedec Judaica Museum, a treasure for that congregation and for Toronto. We saw institutions rising in neighbourhoods both old and new.

We visited Portland, Ore., where we stopped at Beth Israel, a Reform congregation since 1858 that has a historic and magnificent heritage building, surrounded with school and family centres, and staffed by enthusiastic young people who take their Judaism seriously and practice it joyously.

Finally, we spent a week in the growing community of Ashland, Ore., where a young Reconstructionist congregation has great plans. By the time of our next visit, they will be housed in a new building, with a sanctuary, classrooms, and auditorium.

What do these communities have in common (note that I modestly kept silent about British Columbia's growing communities)? They have passion. They have commitment and strength. They have self-assurance in their Jewishness and in their place in North American society. They give to each other, and they give to the larger community through their professions, their volunteer time, and their belief in the power of Judaism to edify and transform society.

I needed to see these communities this year. The situation in Israel, which seems so intractable, stays with me night and day. Being in Israel this year was vital to me, yet at the same time painful in the extreme as we saw the empty stores and closed restaurants and the despair of Israelis who also see no end to the violence. So, to see communities in the bloom and flower of their youth was to once again realize the resilience of our people. Not only do we survive, we thrive.

I emphasize this thriving in part to offset the pain I felt at the only response I received to the letters I wrote several months ago to the heads of the United and Anglican churches in Canada in response to their biased and one-sided view of the Middle East and their failure to condemn the attacks on Israel.

I received nothing from the United Church moderator. As promised, I reprint here the only response I got, from the Anglican Primate Michael G. Peers.

He wrote: "Thank you for your letter … It is quite obvious that you and I take different perspectives on the issues underlying current events in Israel and the occupied territories. At the same time, I am grateful for your response. I hope that the conversation that was brought to an end by the decision of the Canadian Jewish Congress to withdraw from the Canadian Christian-Jewish Consultation will begin again, and that along with Christians and Jews of good faith, you will have an opportunity to speak and listen in true dialogue. In the meantime, I hope that, however we may disagree on degrees of responsibility, we might agree to pray for an end to violence on all sides and to act within our communities as agents of mutual understanding."

Right now, this much-sought-after dialogue seems to be a dialogue of the deaf.

CORRECTION

In Jean Gerber's column, "It's deja vu all over again" (CJN, Aug. 1), it was inaccurately stated that Canadian Magen David Adom for Israel has had its charitable status revoked. In fact, the organization retains its charitable status while it appeals a ruling by the Canada Customs and Revenue Agency. The CJN regrets the error.

Lessons from cottage country

I'm writing this from the screened-in porch of a cottage in Gimli, Man. There are a few crickets chirping outside, the gusty breeze hints at a thunderstorm and, like most Manitoba August nights, there's a slight chill in the air that dares you to make it through the evening sockless.

Stuart Slayen in Winnipeg

Gimli is located about 50 miles north of Winnipeg (yes, there are places north of Winnipeg). The town has a thriving arts community, a strong economy bolstered by farming and fishing, an eclectic population of 1,700 or so, and spectacular scenery. It is no wonder my wife's late grandparents chose to buy this cottage here about 50 years ago.

We feel very blessed to have access to this place. My wife and I feel the stress of the city melt away as soon as we open the screen door (even though it's one of those doors that tends to close too quickly, often colliding with your heel or rear end). More importantly, our three-year-old and one-year-old love it here. They practically live outside. They get lots of backyard play time, not to mention sandcastle building and swimming at the beach and plenty of walking. This year, daughter Cari conquered the red slide at the play structure.

Earlier this summer, we also had the pleasure of visiting our aunt and uncle Gary and Ella Diamond at their summer retreat near Haliburton, Ont. Same thing. The adult stress disappeared and the kids sprang to life. Cari rode in a pedal boat and imitated the loons and her little brother Noah spent hours gleefully throwing handfuls of silt back into Lake Wenona.

A quick aside about Lake Wenona—our adult stress didn't really disappear on schedule. We discovered on the way from Pearson International Airport that highways 12 and 48 didn't just meet, they actually carried on a relationship for a few miles. When they finally broke up, we chose to stay friendly with the wrong one and ended up far out of the way in Orillia (where, if I recall correctly from the old TV commercial, an astonishingly high number of people use Anacin).

What I'm re-learning this summer is something I tend to forget as soon as I return to the nine-to-five routine. Summer tends to rekindle my passion for nature. Spending 10 minutes looking for the perfect skipping rock reminds me of how awe-inspiring, yet fragile, the planet is. The bird songs I hear in the clean air of the country awaken me to the fact there is so much more to this world than schedules, deadlines and meetings.

Our Tanach celebrates nature and heralds the beauty and wonder of all of creation. But how often as an organized community do we talk about our physical environment? When was the last time you heard a rabbi or synagogue leader encourage you to recycle? Or to take a bus to work instead of driving? Has your shul or community centre or Jewish school ever run programs on global warming, water security or pollution? I'm not suggesting these conversations never happen in a Jewish milieu; I'm just not convinced that the environment is on the A-list of topics.

With Rosh Hashanah just around the corner, we will once again be taking stock of our relationship with our fellow men and women. Have we acted morally? Have we acted honestly? How have we measured up as Jews? This year, might I also suggest that we consider our relationship with our environment. Moral behaviour and adherence to halachah are more meaningful on a healthy planet.

This year, I resolve to pay more attention to my physical surroundings—even during the stressful, overscheduled, hurry-up-and-get-inside-before-your-tongue-freezes-to-something Winnipeg winter. I begin tomorrow morning when I will wake Cari at six so that we can feed the gulls and watch the sun rise over massive Lake Winnipeg. If I forget to pay attention to nature over the winter, I'm hoping my daughter will remind me.

Iran's quest for nuclear arms alarms Israel

For more than a decade now, the United States, encouraged by Israel, has tried to thwart Iran's nuclear ambitions.

Washington's non-proliferation efforts focus on persuading Russia to desist from building a nuclear reactor for Iran in the Persian Gulf city of Bushehr. They also hinge on convincing the Russians not to sell the Iranians conventional offensive military equipment, including long-range missiles.

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

Bushehr, in fact, has emerged as an irritant in the United States' warming relationship with Russia.

Last February, U.S. and Russian officials ended a two-day meeting in Moscow sharply at odds over Russia's co-operation with Iran on nuclear – and missile – technology.

Then, in May, at a Moscow summit, U.S. President George W. Bush and Russian President Vladimir Putin failed yet again to resolve the issue – prompting Russia's foreign minister, Igor Ivanov, to remark, "Unfortunately, Iran is a sore point in our relations."

On July 26, the simmering dispute came to a boil when Washington learned that Russian Prime Minister Mikhail Kasyanov had approved plans to build three more reactors in Bushehr and an additional two reactors in Ahwaz, a town north of Bushehr.

The disclosure angered U.S. Energy Secretary Spencer Abraham. As he put it on Aug. 1, on the eve of a meeting with his Russian counterpart: "We have long been concerned that Iran's only interest in nuclear civil power, given its vast domestic energy resources, is to support its nuclear weapons program. For these reasons, we have insistently urged Russia to cease all nuclear co-operation with Iran, including its assistance to the reactor in Bushehr."

Chastened by Washington's reaction, Russia announced that it would reconsider its plans and would take "political factors" into account before expanding its assistance to Iran – a nation whose Islamic fundamentalist regime is not only unfriendly to the United States but is extremely hostile to Israel.

In the meantime, however, Russia is finishing the $800 million (US) 1,000-megawatt reactor in Bushehr. More than 1,000 Russian engineers and technicians work on the site. They are expected to install the reactor's main turbine this month.

By all accounts, Bushehr will be ready in 15 months and operational some 18 months later. Germany began building Bushehr in 1974, when Iran was governed by the pro-Western Pahlavi monarchy, which maintained a panoply of diplomatic, commercial and intelligence ties with Israel.

Germany dropped out in 1979, the year the shah was deposed by the Islamic revolution. Russia, eager to upgrade Soviet-era relations with Iran – a country rich in oil and natural gas – took over the project in 1995.

In essence, the low-grade conflict between the United States and Russia over Bushehr turns on the question of Iranian intentions.

Russia claims that Bushehr is a purely civilian plant designed to develop new energy sources, not nuclear weapons. Putin has assured Bush that Russia has no intention of undermining the process of nuclear non-proliferation. In an interview with Barbara Walters on 20/20, he denied that Russia was helping Iran develop a nuclear capacity.

Besides, Moscow adds, Iran is a signatory to the Nuclear Non-Proliferation Treaty and has allowed inspectors from the International Atomic Energy Agency to visit the Bushehr reactor. After their last meeting several months ago, Putin assured Bush that Russia would press Iran to allow extensive international inspection of the plant.

The United States, which has labelled Iran part of an "axis of evil" nations that seek atomic arms, fears that Tehran will use Russian equipment and expertise to pursue a secret program to produce nuclear weapons that could threaten America and its allies in Europe and the Middle East.

According to experts, neither the technology nor the spent fuel from Bushehr could be used to manufacture a nuclear device. But the same technology can theoretically be utilized to make enriched fuel for nuclear weapons. Furthermore, weapons-grade plutonium could be extracted from the spent fuel to make a nuclear bomb.

In short, Washington wants Russia to ban the export to Iran of potentially dangerous dual-use technology and to penalize private Russian companies that allegedly engage in such commerce. This has been a prime objective of American diplomacy since the days of the Clinton administration.

Russian officials, from Energy Minister Alexander Rumyantsev on down, have promised the United States that they will not permit Iran to gain access to spent fuel. Indeed, Russia passed legislation in 2001 requiring Iran to return spent radioactive material.

According to The Christian Science Monitor, Russia rejected an Iranian request to build a more robust heavy-water reactor in Bushehr. In addition, the newspaper reports, Russia turned down another Iranian request for gas centrifuges, which would have enabled Iran to produce weapons-grade material.

But the United States remains skeptical and considers Russian assistance to Iran as the single most dangerous proliferation threat.

In a monograph published by the Washington Institute for Near East Policy, Chen Zak, a former official in Israel's Atomic Energy Commission, claims that Iran is, in fact, developing a clandestine nuclear weapons program. She writes that the intelligence agencies of the United States, Britain, France, Germany and Israel have unanimously concluded that Iran, its heated denials notwithstanding, is actively working toward that objective.

In the July 29 edition of The Jerusalem Report, Yiftah Shapir, a scholar who monitors the Middle East military balance for the Jaffee Center for Strategic Studies, argues that Bushehr will not be used for nuclear weapons programs beyond the training of a cadre of nuclear scientists. Shapir, however, suspects that Iran is constructing a secret reactor to enrich uranium for weapons use.

Israel, which itself is a nuclear power, has warned Iran that it regards Bushehr – bombed three times by Iraq during the 1980-1988 Iran-Iraq War – as a threat to its national security.

Ha'aretz, the Tel Aviv daily, reported recently that Israel's National Security Council warned that "everything must be done... to prevent Tehran from achieving nuclear weapons capability."

The U.S. Central Intelligence Agency estimates that Iran is seven years away from attaining a nuclear bomb. Israel's estimate is five years. John Pike, director of GlobalSecurity.org, a non-partisan U.S. military and intelligence research centre, believes that the moment of truth is on the horizon.

"Within the next year, either the United States or Israel is going to either attack Iran's (nuclear sites), or acquiesce to Iran being a nuclear state."

The United States and Israel are also worried that Iran, thanks to Russian and Chinese help, is acquiring the delivery systems – long-range missiles – to launch nuclear weapons. In recent years, Iran has tested the Shihab missile, which Israel regards ominously.

In the late 1990s, under American pressure, Russia cancelled three key missile technology deals. Yet Russia apparently continues to play a pivotal role in Iran's missile program.

Viewing Tehran as a crucial partner in the Middle East, Russia cemented relations with Iran in 1989 following the visit to Moscow of President Ali Akbar Hashemi Rafsanjani. Unable to buy arms from the West as a result of U.S. sanctions, which were imposed after Iran's takeover of the American embassy in Tehran in 1979, Iran purchased MiG-29 and Su-24 combat aircraft, and three Kilo-class submarines, from Russia.

In 1995, then U.S. vice-president Al Gore and then Russian prime minister Viktor Chernomyrdin signed an agreement ending all Russian sales of conventional weapons to Iran by December 1999. The accord allowed Russia to fulfill existing sales contracts. Russia withdrew from the agreement two years ago.

Vladimir Putin

Iran's current president, Mohammed Khatami, visited Moscow last March. After Khatami's talks with Putin, Russia agreed to intensify military and technical co-operation with Iran and to supply Iran with a new batch of weaponry: BTR-80 armoured vehicles, T-62 and T-72 tanks and Su-24, Su-25 and MiG 29 combat jets. Putin, somewhat disingenuously, claimed that they were not offensive weapons.

In the wake of his meeting with Khatami, Putin told the Conference of Presidents of Major American Jewish Organizations that Russia would be careful about the kind of arms it would sell to Iran.

"Putin said they would not sell weapons that would endanger Israel," said Malcolm Hoenlein, executive vice-chair of the Conference of Presidents. Yet it remains to be seen whether Putin's assurances are genuine and sincere.

In the meantime, much to Israel's distress, Iran appears to be growing stronger militarily.

An open letter of thanks

By CHAVI ROSENZWEIG

We would like to express our tremendous gratitude to all the Jewish organizations of Toronto who in one capacity or another assisted us most capably in our time of need. Your professionalism, warmth and dedication ensured that every detail was handled with respect, dignity and precision. Your actions were truly a Kiddush Hashem. Thank you so much.

Guest Voice

Thank you to Zaka for your courageous and difficult, yet extremely holy work. Your presence in Toronto at the time of David's z"t"l (zichrono tzaddik l'vrachah) passing was obviously pre-ordained and for this we feel privileged and grateful.

Thank you to the dignitaries/ politicians of the Israeli government who have called us and visited us during our time of pain. Your message is clear – our pain is your pain, our grief and anguish is your grief and anguish, our loss is your loss – we are one people. We are with you. Your message and your presence have provided us with tremendous strength and comfort. Thank you. May we as a nation know of no more pain.

Thank you to Toronto City Council for the moment of silence that was observed in memory of David and for the special tribute you paid to David at meetings held on July 30, 31 and Aug. 1. The notice of condolence was deeply moving and touching. Thank you to those members of Parliament who attended the funeral and/or visited with family members at the shivah and/or sent letters of condolence.

We would like to express our sincerest gratitude to our rabbanim who have provided us with so much strength and direction in our darkest times. Your hespadim (eulogies), your advice, your knowledge and wisdom, your compassion and concern and your availability to us are most appreciated. Thank you so much.

Thank you to our cherished and beloved family and friends whose immeasurable acts of kindness, compassion, generosity, support and love have surpassed and exceeded what one may consider normal acts of familial kindness and goodness and normal acts of friendship. Words do not do justice to our feelings of appreciation for you – our dear family and friends. Your thoughtfulness and generosity of spirit in so many different ways helped us survive the darkest days of our lives. Your words of comfort, guidance, prayers, your presence at Sunnybrook Hospital, your charitable donations, community relations work, loving care of the younger children, delicious meals and comfort foods, the flowers, phone calls, letters and notes, the books you have given us, your listening ear, your hand to hold and your shoulder to cry on, your warm embrace, your presence (which in many cases involved long-distance travelling), and the security you provide for us – for all this and yet more we humbly and gratefully say thank you.

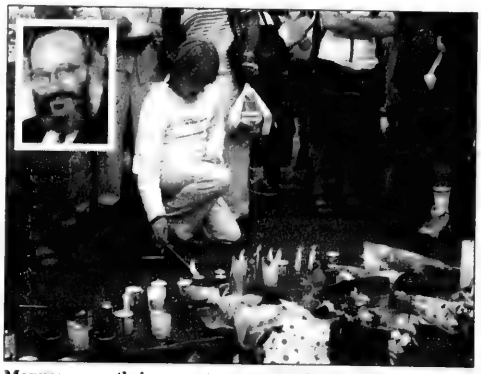
May God grant comfort and strength to all mourners and to all who endure pain and suffering and loss.

May we the Jewish people be blessed with a year of health, happiness, unity and harmony, wisdom and understanding, goodness and peace, and may we be blessed with the coming of Moshiach speedily in our days.

May David's legacy of boundless love of parents and family, goodness, kindness, gentleness, honesty, dignity and integrity, happiness and joy, Jewish pride and religious commitment, respect and love of a fellow Jew, faith and trust and hope in God live on and endure in each of us in some measure.

May David's life be an inspiration to us all and may his memory live within those of us who loved him so dearly from now until eternity.

On behalf of Chavi Rosenzweig's family, Faye Rosenzweig, Arthur and Marcee Rosenzweig and Shloimie and Miriam Rosenzweig.



Mourners pay their respect at a memorial after the slaying of David Rosenzweig (inset).

Canadian Jewish soldiers remembered

MEMORIAL SERVICE:

General Wingate Branch 256 of the Royal Canadian Legion, along with the Jewish War Veterans Post of Canada, recently held their annual memorial service at the Canadian Veterans' War Memorial at Mount Sinai Cemetery. The service is held each year before the High Holy Days in honour of Canadian Jewish soldiers who died on active duty during World War II and Israel's War of Independence, and of the partisans who fought the Nazis.

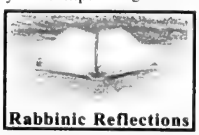
Jewish Life

It takes a village to make a minyan

By RABBI YECHIEL M. GOLDREICH



Rabbinic Reflections

"You are standing today, all of you before God. Your leaders, your tribes, your elders, your officers, every man of Israel. Your wives, your children, the stranger in the midst of your camp. From the hewers of your wood to the drawers of your water, to pass united into the covenant with God." (Deuteronomy 29:9-11)

These words, received by Moses on the last day of his life, during his farewell address to the Jewish people, are read annually on the Shabbat before Rosh Hashanah. The High Holy Days, when synagogues often open a back wall to make extra room, are in many ways a re-enactment of this final day. We all collectively reaffirm our core values as Jews, to pass united into the covenant with God. It's a nice reason to get together.

There is another reason why all Jews gather for High Holy Day services. Our rabbis tell us that prayers, communal as well as individual, are more likely to be met with divine favour when recited by a community.

The Talmud (Kerisus 6a) illustrates the importance of full communal involvement by stating that a prayer service not involving sinners is not acceptable before God. Somehow, these people provide an irreplaceable component to the services. According to the midrash, the hewers of wood and drawers of water were known to lack religious sincerity. Still, their presence was noted and needed.

Apparently, prayers work like a good financial portfolio. Diversification, the involvement of Jews of diverse merit, increases the chances of overall success. Insincerity and sinfulness somehow bring something to the group.

Praying alone has value and may at times feel more natural, but frankly, it is not as effective. We moderns understand very little about prayer's potency and force. We need to rely on the expertise of the ancient prayer masters who wrote our traditional services. They knew the physics of effective praying.

A few years ago, medical researchers conducted a study on the effects of prayer on a random sampling of people in hospitals suffering from a variety of ailments. The names of one group of sick people was given to worshippers. Another list of sick people were not prayed for. Significantly, the prayer recipients were not told that they were being prayed for, discounting any placebo effect.

The results found what traditional religion has long affirmed. Prayer works. The prayer recipients recovered at a significantly greater rate. One of the doctors involved in the study commented that if prayer was a medicine, we would, without hesitation, administer it. No similar all-purpose remedy works so well with so few side effects.

We may not understand the metaphysical properties of all Jews standing together, or appreciate the incomprehensible effect of words whispered, but we all know it works.

A religious intuition draws us onto buses to attend rallies for Israel, to stand in the sun, taking up a few square feet of space, expecting to be undercounted by the media. That same intuition will inexplicably draw us, even our modern wood-hewers and water-drawers, to a High Holy Day service. No matter what our stated position, we all sense and respond to the great spiritual pull that we can never completely unlearn.

During this annual time of greater religious sensitivity, may we all merit to be written and sealed in the Book of Life, and may the coming year be one of redemption.

Rabbi Goldreich is assistant rabbi at Shaarei Shomayim Synagogue in Toronto.

'Jews have loved Jerusalem the most'

MYTH:

Jerusalem need not be the capital of Israel.

FACT:

Ever since King David made Jerusalem the capital of Israel more than 3,000 years ago, the city has played a central role in Jewish existence. The Western Wall in the Old City — the last remaining wall of the ancient Jewish Temple, the holiest site in Judaism — is the object of Jewish veneration and the focus of Jewish prayer. Three times a day, for thousands of years, Jews have prayed "To Jerusalem, thy city, shall we return with joy," and have repeated the Psalmist's oath: "If I forget thee, O Jerusalem, let my right hand forget her cunning."

Jerusalem "has known only two periods of true greatness, and these have been separated by 2,000 years. Greatness has only happened under Jewish rule," Leon and Jill Uris wrote in Jerusalem. "This is so because the Jews have loved her the most, and have remained constant in that love throughout the centuries of their dispersion... It is the longest, deepest love affair in history."

"For 3,000 years, Jerusalem has been the centre of Jewish hope and longing. No other city has played such a dominant role in the history, culture, religion and consciousness of a people as has Jerusalem in the life of Jewry and Judaism," former Jerusalem Mayor Teddy Kollek has written. "Throughout centuries of exile, Jerusalem remained alive in the hearts of Jews everywhere as the focal point of Jewish history, the symbol of ancient glory, spiritual fulfillment and modern renewal. This heart and soul of the Jewish people engenders the thought that if you want one simple word to symbolize all of Jewish history, that word would be 'Jerusalem.'"

MYTH:

Israel has no right to be in the West Bank. Israeli settlements are illegal.

FACT:

Jews have lived in Judea and Samaria – the West Bank – since ancient times. The only time Jews have been prohibited from living in the territories in recent decades was during Jordan's rule from 1948 to 1967. This prohibition was contrary to the Mandate for Palestine adopted by the League of Nations, which provided for the establishment of a Jewish state, and specifically encouraged "close settlement by Jews on the land."

Numerous legal authorities dispute the charge that settlements are "illegal." International law scholar Stephen Schwebel notes that a country acting in self-defence may seize and occupy territory when necessary to protect itself. Schwebel also observes that a state may require, as a condition for its withdrawal, security measures designed to ensure its citizens are not menaced again from that territory (American Journal of International Law, April 1970).

According to Eugene Rostow, a former undersecretary of state for political affairs in the administration of the later U.S. president Lyndon Johnson, Resolution 242 gives Israel a legal right to be in the West Bank. The resolution "allows Israel to administer the territories" it won in 1967 "until 'a just and lasting peace in the Middle East' is achieved," Rostow wrote (New Republic, Oct. 21, 1991).

Klezmer & the Internet – pt. 2

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

Last week, we looked at some great places to read about Klezmer online. This week, we look at ways to sample some of the world's best niggunim (tunes) right at your computer.

One of the finest online assortments of Klezmer music that I have come across is at the Ashkenaz site. There are lengthy excerpts from Ashkenaz '97, including performances by the Flying Bulgar Klezmer Band, the Israeli quartet Esta, Holland's Salomon Klezmorim, Boston's Naftule's Dream and much more. [http://www.ivritype.com/ashkenaz/sounds.html] Also, don't miss Jewishmusic.com, which offers complete selections of the best performers anywhere. Go to [http://www.jewishmusic.com/], click on "Audio Library" and then "Klezmer."

Two wonderful Klezmer CD's are Itzhak Perlman's award-winning In the Fiddler's House and his Live in the Fiddler's House, which Perlman recorded with some of the best groups around, such as Brave Old World, the Klezmatics and the Klezmer Conservatory Band. (It takes a bit of work to find these links but it's worth it. You can listen to all of Perlman's first CD online and a third of the second CD. To find them, click on [http://shlk.com/144], then go to the bottom of the page and click on "All Recordings".)

The Israeli-Jewish-Yiddish-Hebrew-Folk-Cultural Music Midi Free Library [http://members.aol.com/israelmidi/index.html#FOLK] doesn't specialize in Klezmer, but you can find a few Yiddish tunes there like Frailakh and Im Zer Kotzim Koev. Take a listen to excerpts from the Brookline, Mass., radio show, the Yiddish Voice. [http://www.yv.org] And you can hear 20 minutes of the lively fiddling of Steve Greenman online. [http://www.klezmershack.com/demos/980822.greenfidl.am] Steve has played with several bands in Cleveland and New York.

If you prefer to watch some Klezmer masters in the comfort of your home, rent the video A Tickle in the Heart (1996). The documentary profiles veteran Klezmer performers Julie, Willie and Max Epstein. Just when the eighty-something brothers tried to retire to Florida, Klezmer music enjoyed a resurgence and the Epstein brothers were stars again. The Gazette in Montreal called Tickle "one part musical history, one part Seinfeld, and totally enthralling." [http://us.imdb.com/Title? 0117907]

Less well-known is the documentary The Last Klezmer: Leopold Kozlowski (1995). [http://us.imdb.com/TUrls?COM+0113610] It follows the gifted Jewish musician on a journey through the Yiddish musical traditions of Eastern Europe. Kozlowski is a Holocaust survivor who still lives in Poland. The San Francisco Chronicle called the film as "soulful and elegiac as it is sweetly humorous." Another film, A Jumpin' Time in the Garden of Eden (1988). [http://www.jclla.org/videoh.htm] also looks at the early greats of Klezmer music, but then focuses on its resurgence with such bands as the Klezmer Conservatory Band and Kapelye.

Zemerl is a site that not only has a great selection of songs but also includes lyrics so that you can sing along. [http://www.princeton.edu/zemerl/] You can read up (and listen to) Mekhuteneste Mayne, which tells the story "half-joking and half-begging of a mother who is giving away a bride who wants her daughter to be treated well in the in-laws' home." And if you know the lyrics to Momele (as sung by Connie Francis) or to Fiddler on the Roof, the folks at Zemerl want to hear from you.

If all these sites whet your appetite for more and you're in the Toronto area, you can visit the Ashkenaz Festival, being held over the Labour Day weekend at Harbourfront [http://www.ashkenazfestival.org/].

Klezmer music is never boring and neither are the names of Klezmer groups. I leave you with some of my favourite names: there's Yiddishe Cup [http://www.klezmershack.com/bands/ycup/klez/ycup.klez.html], the Jews Brothers [http://www.jewsbrothers.com/], the Klez Dispensers [http://www.princeton.edu/~klez/] and, of course, Tennessee Schmaltz [http://techno-info.com/TennesseeSchmaltz/].

Some New Year thoughts on books and reading

Among your resolutions for the year, how about several concerned with books, reading and study?

Judah Bar Ilai, a second-century sage, once deeply impressed a pagan in the marketplace with his radiant face. "This man," said the pagan, "must either be intoxicated or he has just discovered a hidden treasure." Rabbi Judah overheard him and said, "Friend, I do not drink except when I must for ritual purposes. Neither have I found any treasure. I am a poor man." "Then what makes your face shine so?" asked the man. "That is quite simple," Rabi Judah answered. "I study all the time, and the quest for knowledge makes the face of a man shine."

Long before the creation of the modern science of education and the founding of the adult education movement, Jews discovered the basic truths that adults are teachable, that study is enjoyable, and that learning is a lifelong process.

How does one find time for books? One finds time for books by taking it. Even in our computer age, books are still the best way to preserve and transmit ideas. The printed book is a neat, compact, well-behaved invention; it waits for you, for centuries sometimes. It is there when you want it. You need no apparatus to deal with a book. It slips into your pocket; it fits your hand; it yields to your eye. A book asks no questions of your colour or creed or college degree.

Encomia, words of praise for books and reading, are widespread and eloquent.

American author Clarence Day once wrote that "[t]he world of books is the most remarkable creation of man. Nothing else that he builds ever lasts. Monuments fall; nations perish; civilizations grow old and die out; and, after an era of darkness, new races build on others. But in the world of books are volumes that have seen this happen again and again, and yet live on, still young, still as fresh as the day they were written, still telling men's hearts of the hearts of men centuries dead."

Solomon Schechter, the Cambridge University scholar who discovered the treasures of the Cairo Genizah, made clear the inextricable relationship between Jews and the Bible, the Book of Books, which has kept Judaism alive through the ages.

"Our great claim to the gratitude of mankind is that we gave to the world the word of God, the Bible," Shechter once wrote. "We stormed heaven to snatch down this heavenly gift; we threw ourselves into the breach and covered it with our bodies against every attack; we allowed ourselves to be slain by hundreds and thousands rather than become unfaithful to it; and bore witness to its truth and watched over its purity in the face of a hostile world."

Finally, there is much to consider in the following two selections from the midrash. The first teaches that the sword and the Book came down from heaven wrapped together. The Holy One said: "Keep what is written in the Book, or be delivered to the sword." The other midrash maintains that a learned bastard stands higher on the social scale then an ignorant high priest.

Israel Mall proves a success

Arrangements were complex and Kaplan was assisted in that by a close Israeli friend, Yossi Landau. Landau, who is in the shipping business, helped facilitated the transport of the merchandise at much reduced freight rates.

In Canada, Commerce Custom Brokers waived their usual brokerage fees and Humboldt Properties, landlords of the building that hosted the Israel Mall, donated the space. Print Three produced 30,000 black and white advertising flyers at no cost while local families agreed to billet visiting Israeli merchants during their stay. At the Israel Mall itself, more than 100 volunteers helped staff the vendor displays.

Aharon Shahar was taken aback by the outpouring of support from the Toronto Jewish community. The owner of Kakadu, a firm that produces painted wooden objects, Shahar said that by day three of the Israel Mall he was almost sold out.

Shahar said Kakadu, which has three of its own stores in Israel, will net $20,000 (US) from the Israel Mall. The money is important for the company's cash flow and will go to pay suppliers, who have extended their deadlines far beyond what is considered prudent. He has also felt a cash crunch from retailers of his products.

"People pay 150 days after delivery and you say 'thank you,'" he said. "We put more energy into collecting the money than into marketing."

Beyond the business benefits of the Israel Mall, Shahar said "the energy we got and the sympathy from the community was unbelievable. When I come to Israel, it's hard for me to explain that Israel is not alone. I think Israelis don't realize that they're not alone.

> 'We are really grateful for what is happening here'

"We are really grateful for what is happening here. I'm not sentimental, but if if Israelis knew how the Canadian and American Jews are connected to Israel, they'd feel different. They don't know."

Amir Kitron is general manager of Kedem, a seven-year-old company that manufactures therapeutic products made with herbs from the Judean Desert.

Kedem has been particularly affected by the drop in tourism to the Dead Sea and Eilat and has experienced a 30 to 35 per cent fall-off in its Israeli sales. Kitron was hoping the Israel Mall would boost the company's profile and help him establish local contacts who would market Kedem's products to local pharmacies and health food stores.

Eli Rottenberg, a salesperson for Hadad silver merchants, said sales in Israel have dropped 50 to 60 per cent. "Our exports, thank God, have held up."

Rottenberg said Hadad was expected to generate $40,000 to $50,000 (US) in gross sales in Toronto. "If we have one of these every few months, it would inject new cash that could keep the whole operation afloat, so we don't have to lay off workers."

Yossi Winter, president of the Toronto Zionist Council, said merchants have been happy with the response from the community, which he said was expressing "a feeling of solidarity with the people of Israel. They want to help. Not too many can afford to travel to Israel... They find this is an easy way to show their support."

Others in the Jewish community have fashioned different responses to Israel's difficult economic situation. Earlier this summer, the Chabad Israeli Centre distributed 30,000 flyers encouraging the purchase of Israeli products.

"The feedback was unbelievable," said Rabbi Israel Landa, who noted people are willing to spend more for an imported product than an equivalent domestic one if it helps an Israeli company.

Rabbi Landa said Chabad is planning a second phase in its campaign that will "encourage people participating in a simchah to buy something Israeli."

In other developments, the Israel Now consortium, which includes more than 100 Jewish organizations as well as the Israeli Consulate, announced it too is launching a "Buy Israeli" project in which it encourages consumers to look for a "made in Israel" label.

"It is the most frequent and least expensive way for all members of the community to support Israel," said Joe Fox, who proposed the idea to the consortium.

"Our goal is to make it easier to buy Israeli products," said Howard English, a spokesperson for UJA Federation, a key player in the consortium. The consortium plans to begin publicizing its Buy Israeli efforts in an advertising campaign that will likely kick off in September, he added.

Meanwhile in the United States, the first Israeli Fair debuted June 2 in Riverdale, N.Y. Toronto marked the 15th such fair – though the first in Canada – and it was followed by a two-day event in Montreal.

Meredith Weiss, national director of the Coalition for Jewish Concerns – Amcha, said the activist organization conceived of the Israel fairs as a way of aiding merchants from Ben Yehuda Street in downtown Jerusalem. They have been especially affected by terrorist bombings, often right in front of their shops. Three quarters of the vendors at the first fair were from Ben Yehuda, with the remaining merchants from other areas affected by terror attacks.

Since then, a rolling list of vendors from across the country has been developed "to spread the wealth," she said.

With the success of the first round of Israel fairs, Amcha's plans are to expand to 35 different communities in October and November, to take advantage of the pre-Chanukah shopping season. Fairs are slated for California, Texas, Florida, Ohio, Delaware, Chicago and even London, England.

The rationale for the fairs is simple and goes beyond quantifiable factors. "It's really connected the two countries and Israelis don't feel isolated," Weiss said.

'Situation' has no solution, Israeli news editor says

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

Israel is in the midst of its most troubling period in recent history, says the senior news editor of IBA News, Israel's only English language television newscast.

"I have lived there since 1974, and I can't remember a time as troubling as now," Steve Leibowitz told a recent meeting of Canadian Jewish Congress, Ontario region's public policy and Israel affairs committee.

A native of New York City, Leibowitz is a former reporter with the Jerusalem Post and a former deputy director of the Government Press Office. He was in Toronto for Flag Bowl 2002, the world flag football championships, as manager of Israel's national team.

In the past, he said, Israel usually knew what its goals were, what it was trying to accomplish and how to solve the problem.

"It seems now, however, that we are in a situation in which there is no solution. We have tried the 'Barak' method of giving up almost everything – even more than the Israelis would agree to give – and that didn't work.

"Now we are in the process of trying overwhelming force, and it too is not working successfully," he said.

Israel has caught more than 90 per cent of potential suicide bombers "and has knocked off the entire most-wanted list, but they keep coming.

"[There are always more] terrorists who are willing to die for the cause and who are willing to cause intolerable suffering to their own people."

In an attempt to block terrorists, Leibowitz said, Israel has allocated millions of dollars to build a security fence between Israel and the West Bank.

"The idea is to create obstacles. We are saying that we can't live with them or make peace with them so we are creating a physical separation.

"This separation will cause tremendous anguish for Israeli Arabs who want to maintain trade and family contacts inside the West Bank."

Leibowitz said that Haim Ramon, who is running for the leadership of the Labor Party, wants complete physical separation, and foresees giving up most of the settlements.

"He has no interest in holding their territories or administering to their people. Many Israelis on the left are exasperated after Camp David. They saw that [former prime minister Ehud] Barak was willing to go so far, yet [Palestinian Authority President Yasser] Arafat was not willing to meet him."

Arafat's position has not changed at all, Leibowitz said. "He is not willing to compromise, except for [allowing] a narrow path to the Western Wall."

Many Israelis wonder what Jewish people today are doing in the Gaza Strip, he said. "These are not idealists. They are people who saw inexpensive land on which to build a house and do some farming. People ask what the future is for residents of such an area. Will their children ever know peace?"

He acknowledged that the majority of Palestinian Arabs would like to live in peace with Israel and do not think that their leadership is leading them well or bringing them any closer to it.

"For all the damage that has been done to us, their damage has been worse. They are malnourished and starving; their situation is intolerable. There is a level of hatred and incitement, and they blame their leadership as much as ours."

What is needed, said Leibowitz, is a Palestinian who is willing to negotiate – someone who envisions justice for both sides.

"There is a reign of terror, however, and no one will rise up and challenge it."

Kolel offering unique unservice

Kolel: The Adult Centre for Liberal Jewish Learning is offering a unique unservice for the upcoming High Holy Days.

The unservice is an egalitarian, interactive exploration of the High Holy Days through readings, text study and discussion.

Gail Gould, executive director of Kolel, says the new program is for people who want an opportunity to discover the High Holy Days through discussion of text.

"There will be no sermons, but ample opportunity for interaction.

"It will appeal to those individuals looking for a non-traditional High Holy Day experience. This smaller, less formal environment will allow participants an opportunity to explore in more depth, contemporary and traditional texts and readings," she said.

The unservice, to be held at the Kolel building, 151 Eglinton Ave. W., on the first day of Rosh Hashanah, Kol Nidre evening and Yom Kippur, will be led by Greg Beiles, a Judaic educator and co-ordinator of Toronto Heschel School's junior high. Child care will not be available.

For information, call Kolel at 416-485-7007 ext. 0.

SUMMER OF SORROW. CAMPAIGN OF HOPE.

Now that summer is coming to a close, it's time to consider the severe situation faced by the people of Israel.

This has been a summer of sorrow in Israel. The death toll from terror attacks now exceeds 600. The number of Israelis who have been physically or psychologically wounded by terror is growing daily. It is nothing short of a national tragedy. And Israel's already shaky economy is under increasingly severe stress, with an estimated $16 billion CDN in lost output this year.

Israel's emergency is far from over. That's why we need your commitment to complete this historic UJA Federation Israel Emergency Campaign 2003. A campaign of hope.

Through your extraordinary generosity, we have already raised $53 million. Over $18 million represents new and additional donations to help thousands of Israelis rebuild their shattered lives.

As a community, we should be proud of our strong contribution to a remarkable North American campaign through which several hundred thousand Jews have contributed $310 million U.S. on Israel's behalf. However, we have a significant challenge ahead.

We have to reach over 7,000 community members here in Toronto who have yet to make a gift. If you are among them, your participation in this crucial campaign is vital to help ease Israel's painful burden and to demonstrate strength in the face of a brutal trail of violence against Israel.

Because we are truly stronger together.

We wish you, your families and the entire Jewish people a New Year of peace, health and happiness.

Shaar Shalom's new cantor aims for greater outreach

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

At age 27 and with four years of experience under his belt at Beth Jacob Synagogue in Hamilton, Ont., Cantor Ben Silverberg can no longer say he's the youngest congregational cantor in the country.

But the newly appointed chazzan at Thornhill's Shaar Shalom Congregation feels a special responsibility – partly because of his age – to reach out to his own 20-to-30-year-old age group as well as to younger people like high schoolers in United Synagogue Youth (USY), "to show that [the synagogue] is a fun place to be, and a meaningful place to be."

Silverberg, a Toronto native whose father Michael was also a cantor, realized that the synagogue was where he wanted to build his career when he was 15 or 16, leading the davening on a substitute basis at the Bernard Betel Centre. His efforts were appreciated by the seniors who attended services there, he recalls.

"I really loved the fact that they seemed to enjoy what I was doing. I liked the sociability aspect...the socializing, the kibbitzing. I liked the dynamic."

And he loves having the opportunity to sing, although until his bar mitzvah he was too shy to seek the limelight. He used to turn down offers of solos in the youth choir at Adath Israel Congregation, he recalled in an interview in his new office.

Ben Silverberg

The idea of making a career out of something he enjoyed appealed to Silverberg. As a student at William Lyon Mackenzie Collegiate Institute, he began studying voice privately and served as ba'al musaf for family services on the High Holy Days at Adath Israel Congregation.

Longtime friends from his days at United Synagogue Day School were supportive of his career choice, although they were not necessarily regular shul-goers.

And Silverberg's father encouraged him too, although he himself had left the cantorate. "But he said, 'If you're going to do it, you have to do it right. You need a solid musical foundation.'" The two worked on sight-singing every night after dinner until Silverberg mastered the concept.

While he was working on his BA in Judaic studies at York University, Silverberg, a lyric baritone, studied chazzanut with Cantor Benjamin Maissner for three years. At the same time, he sang in Beth Tzedec Congregation's professional choir.

He later honed his interpretation and liturgy skills with Cantor David Bagley, and now works with Cantor David Nemtzov on nuances like "colouring" and shading of the voice.

Although he describes his style as traditional, Silverberg sometimes introduces secular melodies – a show tune, for example – into the liturgical setting. "I do this to engage people. If I can make people sit up in their chairs and bring them into the service and elicit some sort of excitement, then I think I'm doing my job."

Although he only took on his position at Shaar Shalom Aug. 1, he is already impressed by the participation level of congregants at the 550-family shul, he said.

"They sing the melodies they know with gusto, but when I introduce something new, they have very acute musicality and can pick up on it very quickly and join me."

The cantor's own musicality reflects an eclectic background that includes outings to the opera and the Nutcracker Suite when he was a youngster.

These days, his non-cantorial music tastes range from opera to rap.

"I love the ability to express yourself with the voice. You can speak a phrase but it doesn't have the same impact as when you sing a phrase."

North Bay: A new gang of kids in town

By ADAM GRACHNIK
CJN Intern

NORTH BAY, Ont. — Marty Brown forces open a wooden door and steps carefully down the rotting, cobweb-filled stairs leading to the dark cellar. Inside, a pungent smell fills the low, concrete room. Brown coughs as an animal quickly escapes through a crack. He stops, smiles broadly and points to a stained dirty bath-like structure built into the corner of the small room.

It's a mikvah, built in the '60s but never used. The look – and smell – of the ritual bath in the cellar of the historic Sons of Jacob synagogue tell of the fate that awaited the North Bay Jewish community.

A community once young and vibrant was quickly aging.

But something unusual happened. The downward trend reversed and now, unlike most small communities around Ontario, many in the Jewish population here are no longer bubbies and zaides – they're children still years away from their bar and bat mitzvahs.

"[It's] the start of a new renaissance of people," said Brown's father, Herb Brown, who was born in North Bay in the early '20s and is still the president of Sons of Jacob.

While Jewish life in North Bay thrived at mid-century, booming to 60 families, the '70s and '80s were low points, as young people moved away, leaving behind a community that slowly dwindled.

But people are starting to come back. The population has stopped decreasing and is now stable at 20 families, and the new young Jews in town are wondering why they didn't come sooner.

"I started my day today by dragging my boats to shore and bailing out the water with my kids," said Dr. Les Rosoph at an Italian restaurant down the street from his dermatology practice. "[Living here] is the whole camp experience all over again.

"I don't make appointments to go to the beach. I make appointments to go to the city," the father of three added. "You have to like the outdoors. You're not spending your entire life in traffic or worrying about your mortgage."

Rosoph has three kids under the age of six. His good friend Dr. Bernie Goldfarb has four children all under 10 years old. Together this group makes up a large portion of the 17 students who now attend the local Hebrew school in the historic shul, built at the turn of the century.

Goldfarb, a urologist from Toronto, planned to spend two years in North Bay when he moved to the town in 1995, but as his wife Lisa says, "By our first year, we forgot we would give it two. We liked it so much."

The Goldfarb's, with their four children, are pumping new life into the North Bay Jewish community. Seen here (bottom-left going clockwise) Ronen, Lisa, Rose, Bernie, Jacob and Eli. [Jeff Bercuson photos]

"It's the best place in the world to live. It's the best kept secret out there," Bernie Goldfarb said from the kitchen table of their rustic cottage on Lake Talon 30 minutes outside of North Bay. "It's a good place to practise and raise kids. I enjoy it. It's outdoors and easy to get around."

Lisa Goldfarb, who taught the Hebrew school for a year when the couple first arrived, said the community is warm.

"It's nice [that on] Yom Kippur everyone comes together for the breaking of the fast at the shul. Everyone makes food together, everyone has to be responsible," the Toronto native said.

Both the Rosophs and the Goldfarbs grew up in large cities surrounded almost entirely by other Jews. They admit that being in North Bay has increased their feeling of responsibility in being Jewish.

"In Toronto it's easy to be Jewish," Lisa Goldfarb said.

"I can't hide behind others," Rosoph said. "As a kid, I rallied around everyone else. I didn't have the same sense of belonging. Here everything matters."

Marty Brown agreed, but admitted that he was surrounded by more Jewish children when he grew up here in the '50s and '60s. He remembers the breaking of the fast tradition that always brought the community together after Yom Kippur. When he was at the Hebrew school, there were 40 students, but as the young people graduated, many slowly started going to seek bigger, richer dreams in Toronto.

Brown joined them and moved to there in the mid-'70s, managing one of two family businesses. Shortly after arriving, he married and started his family.

But something was missing.

After only eight years in Toronto, he sold the business and returned to North Bay with his family.

"I realized what was good and came back here," said the father of two university-aged children "[It was a] great thing for my kids to grow up in North Bay. They learned to swim on the beach and instantly took up skiing."

Coast to Coast

Growth in North Bay

Herb Brown (right) has been in North Bay since the 20s. He's seen here with his son Marty (middle) and newcomer to town Dr Les Rosoph (left).

But he was shocked at the change he found when he returned. All of his "buddies" were gone and there wasn't a single Jewish merchant on Main Street.

He remembered his father once sending him down Main Street to gather people for a minyan.

His father, who has lived in North Bay all his life, has witnessed many changes in the community. He said Jews arrived in North Bay from eastern Europe in the early 1900s and many became merchants and opened up stores.

Herb Brown said services used to be held in people's stores or in their homes. His father was a tailor and very active in the local congregation, and Brown remembers him collecting $2 to $4 from people for membership dues after a furniture store was bought and converted into a shul in 1925.

The community kept kosher, and he remembers his mother keeping chickens, and the rabbi, as Brown said, "taking care of them," so they were kosher to eat.

In the '30s and '40s, more Jews began coming to North Bay to open up stores and start a new life. Brown said that "locals in North Bay knew not to go shopping during Yom Kippur or Pesach, because all the stores were closed."

In the '30s Brown won the city basketball championships with the St. John Anglican Church. He said he never experienced any anti-Semitism in North Bay.

"I mixed with everything, played with everyone. It was a good life."

In 1947, after Brown returned from the army, he opened H.E. Brown Supply – an automotive parts and truck equipment distributor. He still works out of the office in North Bay every day.

According to Brown, the Jewish community was always close and Jewish education was very important. "We had 100 per cent attendance. If a family couldn't afford [the school], the rest looked after them."

This is a value that is equally important to the new families in town.

"I want my kids to grow up to be proud to be Jewish," said Rosoph, who admits that it has been tough to get teachers from Toronto to come up and teach.

However, thanks to the Regional Jewish Communities of Ontario (RJCO), an organization that links 27 small Jewish communities together under the banner of United Israel Appeal, the community will soon welcome a teacher from Israel.

The RJCO helps make the link to Project Arevim, which sends an Israeli to small communities to live and teach there for a year.

"The people there [in North Bay] work especially hard to invest in a Jewish way of life," said RJCO director of community development Michael Soberman. "Their willingness to invest in Arevim is an excellent thing."

While strolling on his dock, Goldfarb said the "Arevim program has been good. We [still] need teachers who want a different experience and [want to] see a different part of the world."

Small communities usually struggle because there are a lack of professional opportunities with no large hospitals or universities. North Bay, however, is different.

In 1967, Herb Brown became one of the founders of Nipissing University, which, he said, "is [still] growing rapidly."

In September, construction will begin on a brand new $200-million hospital with a psychiatric building and become a regional referral centre. Goldfarb said "it's a great opportunity for North Bay and there will be tons of new jobs."

Herb Brown added that Cannadore College is now partnered with Nipissing University and expanding its aviation program by constructing a new building at the local Jack Garland Airport.

The building will be used for aviation training, aircraft maintenance and assembly, injecting life into the local economy.

As well, hangars from an old Canadian Armed Forces base have provided space for leading aviation firms to open up operations.

In addition, the waterfront is being revamped and the highway leading into town is being expanded to four lanes.

There is clearly a new breath of life in the city, but will the Jewish community last?

"I don't think my kids will come back, but there is a future here," said Marty Brown, whose older daughter has already moved away.

"We don't expect our kids will stay," the Goldfarbs agreed. "It's a good place for a family, but not for a single person. They [the children] will go away, get married and maybe come back here with a family."

Rosoph, on the other hand, is extremely optimistic and not thinking that far ahead.

"It will be good for quite awhile. There are lots of opportunities here," he said with his blue eyes lighting up as he explained how his kids can walk to a ski hill and that he lives right on the water.

"There used to be a lot of adults when I arrived. Now it has flipped and there is this gang of kids."

"Those people who like good fresh air, with no smog, will love it," Herb Brown added. "Everyone is accepted [here]. Some are intermarried, but everyone is accepted. We have a tremendous environment, friendly community and excellent facilities. We're five minutes from everywhere."

"North Bay has a viable future as a Jewish community, thanks to [people] who are moving in with their children. I think we will have a Jewish community here for a long time," his son Marty added.

"There is no way we're leaving this place. Every hour spent on the highway is an hour wasted in your life," said Goldfarb.

"We just want young people to come," he added.

Calgarians are solidly pro-Israel, poll finds

By JUDY SHAPIRO
Jewish Free Press

CALGARY — A new group of young professionals here has discovered that when it comes to being pro-Israel, they are not alone.

According to a survey sponsored by Stand With Israel, a grassroots group of 20 Jews and non-Jews, Calgarians in general are also staunchly pro-Israel in their attitudes.

The results of the poll, the group's first project since its formation last month, were released in early August.

"We did this [poll] to find out what Calgarians really think," explained Stand With Israel spokesperson Randy Shapiro. "We know what CNN thinks, we know what [CBC Middle East correspondent] Neil MacDonald thinks, but the question is: are politicians and the media in sync with the public?

"We found out that the public is way ahead of the media and politicians" when it comes to support for Israel.

Of the 432 Calgarians polled in July, 86 per cent said the Palestinians should replace Palestinian Authority (PA) President Yasser Arafat; 71 per cent felt the war on terror should include the PLO and Hamas; 62 per cent said Palestinians who target Israel with bombs should be called terrorists rather than militants or resistance fighters; and 65 per cent said Canada should suspend foreign aid to the PA.

Seventy-eight per cent believe Canada should take a balanced position and not side with either the Palestinians or with Israel, while 78 per cent said Canada was wrong to vote for UN resolutions that condemned Israel for violence but did not also condemn the Palestinians.

The poll, conducted by JMCK Strategy, has a margin of error of plus or minus five percentage points 19 times out of 20. Members of Stand With Israel composed the questionnaire and political scientist Faron Ellis, a professor at Lethbridge Community College, aided in the statistical analysis.

Shapiro, a Calgary lawyer, found the results to the questions about Arafat to be particularly illuminating.

"Eighty-six point four per cent voted to replace Arafat – the public want Arafat replaced. I think Jewish people know that Arafat has been responsible for precipitating catastrophe wherever he goes, but [the poll shows] that the public in general also understand this."

Shapiro found it surprising that Calgarians seemed to be aware of a rise in anti-Jewish incidents in Canada, but were not aware of an incident that took place in their own backyard – the firebombing of an Edmonton synagogue last year.

Stand With Israel is not aligned politically or religiously with any other group. Shapiro said its formation arose from its members' desire to demonstrate their support for Israel at a time when the Jewish State is "constantly barraged by suicide bombings and terror."

Although unaligned politically, Shapiro believes members of Stand With Israel do hold some common views.

"The last 24 months have made everyone a little more right-leaning than they've historically been," Shapiro said. "I think I can say that everyone supported Oslo and [former Israeli prime minister Ehud] Barak when it looked like peace was in the offing. And everyone in the group sees right through Arafat and doesn't [consider him] a peace partner anymore."

Do you believe that media coverage of the Israeli-Palestinian conflict is fair and balanced, or is it unfairly biased towards one side or the other?

Fair and balanced	55%
Pro-Israel	36%
Pro-Palestinian	9%

There has been some debate in the media about what words should be used to describe Palestinians who target Israeli cities with bombs. Some media call them "resistance fighters," some call them "terrorists" and some call them "militants." Which label do you think most accurately describes these bombers?

Resistance fighters	17%
Terrorists	62%
Militants	21%

Study shows 'pro-Israel Calgarians are not alone'

In forming their new group, members chose not to work through existing Jewish organizations, although Shapiro said that they all do good work.

He joked that his group's members were too impatient to work through committees and existing structures.

"Maybe we're all impatient type A personalities," he said.

Other groups in the Jewish community, he said, tend to be more inward-looking, and the members of Stand With Israel wanted to fill a perceived gap by drawing together Jews and non-Jews who are passionately pro-Israel.

The group wants to focus its energies on "interfacing with other communities, to do outreach and liaise with any other person who supports Israel," Shapiro said.

"The study has shown that pro-Israel Calgarians are not alone and that the majority of Calgarians are with them."

The poll is meant to be the group's first project. In the future, members hope to bring in pro-Israel speakers to address the Calgary community as a whole and to continue educating the public and explaining the Israeli position in the Middle East conflict.

Since the poll's release, several people have called Shapiro to express interest in joining the group. He said he hopes it will be the beginning of a grassroots movement that will spread across the country.

Calgarians' views on Israel

George W. Bush, the U.S. President, has called for a war on terrorists in any country, and Jean Chrétien, Canada's Prime Minister, has agreed. Do you think that should include Palestinian groups like the PLO and Hamas?

Include PLO and Hamas	71%
Not include	29%

President Bush has said that the Palestinians should replace Yasser Arafat by holding democratic elections. What do you think?

Replace Arafat	86%
Continue with Arafat	14%

The Israeli army has launched Operation Defensive Shield, repeatedly sending soldiers and tanks into Arab towns. The Israeli government says it needs to arrest terrorists, and shut down bomb factories. Palestinian groups say it is harassment by the Israelis. What is your opinion?

Israel needs to arrest terrorists	63%
Israel is harassing Palestinians	37%

At the United Nations, Canada has voted repeatedly to condemn Israel for violence, but Canada has not voted to condemn Palestinian violence. Was Canada right to do so?

Correct	22%
Wrong	78%

The Canadian government gives more than $100 million each year to Yasser Arafat and the Palestinians in foreign aid. What do you think of this?

Increase aid	8%
Maintain current aid levels	28%
Suspend aid	65%

Jean Chrétien, Canada's Prime Minister, has said that Canada should take a balanced view of the situation, and not side with either Israel or the Palestinians. What is your opinion? Canada should:

Take a balanced view	78%
Should side with Israel	19%
Side with the Palestinians	4%

Netanyahu to help launch Winnipeg CJA campaign

By MYRON LOVE
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — This city's annual Combined Jewish Appeal campaign starts Sept. 9 with the first-ever appearance here by former Israeli prime minister Benjamin Netanyahu.

Community leaders say he is one of the highest-ranking Israeli officials ever to speak in the Manitoba capital.

"We haven't had an Israeli speaker of his stature and ability to communicate to an English-speaking diaspora Jewish audience since [former Israeli ambassador to the United Nations] Abba Eban," says CJA executive director Gerry Koffman.

"Whether you agree with his ideological position or not, [Netanyahu] is able to articulate with passion his views on Israel – I have heard him speak for almost an hour without notes – and he is equally knowledgeable about events in Iraq and Iran."

Netanyahu's appearance in Winnipeg and his appearances in Ottawa, Toronto and Montreal are being co-sponsored by the Asper Foundation.

Koffman says media mogul and philanthropist Israel Asper's connections with Netanyahu facilitated the Canadian speaking tour.

As for the Asper Foundation's participation in this year's CJA campaign, Koffman says it is not the first time CJA has sponsored a speaker or program in conjunction with another communal organization.

Benjamin Netanyahu

"It tells me that in our community, everybody works together," Koffman says. "As well, the Asper family is involved in the community in many ways."

Campaign organizers and the Asper Foundation are expecting a tremendous response to Netanyahu's presentation. They have booked the 1,400-seat Pantages Theatre and expect that tickets will go quickly.

Because of the yamim tovim, Super Week – Sept. 8 to 14 – will be somewhat truncated this year. Super Sunday will be at the end of the week rather than at the beginning and will be cut short because of Yom Kippur in the evening.

This year's campaign goal is $4 million.

"Our campaign is based on two fundamental pillars," Koffman says.

"There is our ongoing commitment to and connection with Israel and the events in the Middle East. Then there are our local community needs, including the federation's new Grow Winnipeg initiative [to increase the size of the Jewish community].

"Our emergency campaign for Israel did very well in the spring. We are optimistic that the community will respond equally positively to the annual campaign and that [Netanyahu's] visit will give us a big boost."

Koffman also notes that community leaders have scheduled a second mission to Israel from Oct. 26 to Nov. 3 and that Manitoba Premier Garry Doer and Dave Chomiak, the province's minister of health, will be on it.

Giving succour to violence is wrong

According to Reports

By PAUL MICHAELS

Tom Friedman's New York Times article, "Fog of War," (Aug. 18) recapitulated points made several months ago in his "Suicidal Lies": that the Palestinians could have achieved a state through negotiations at Camp David and in the months following; and that far from being acts of desperation, suicide bombs are a strategic weapon of choice deliberately undertaken not to end the occupation of the West Bank and Gaza Strip but to undermine Israel's existence.

Critics of Israel who excoriate Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon but who ignore and deny by insisting that the Palestinians are only "resisting occupation" are either naive or malicious.

Judy Rebick recently devoted an article entirely to Israel's alleged wrongdoings ("Ramallah Revelations," Maclean's, July 29). She avoided any mention of Palestinian Authority (PA) Yasser Arafat's rejection of the Barak-Clinton offers in summer/fall of 2000. Perhaps, like other apologists for the Palestinians and their resort to violence, she felt that Camp David was inadequate. But to ignore Israel's overtures entirely is breathtakingly obtuse.

Then there is the "suicide bombing is justified resistance" bandwagon. In June, Cheri Blair, the wife of British Prime Minister Tony Blair, expressed sympathy for suicide bombers on the very day 19 Israelis were slaughtered by one. More recently, Karen Armstrong, the former nun and highly respected author of numerous books on the major religions, claimed that "The [Palestinian] resistance will be as ruthless and violent as the occupation is... Palestinians don't have F-16s, and they don't have tanks... They only have their own bodies" (Al-Ahram Weekly, July 4-10). If the quote is accurate, it indicates an abysmal moral failure irrespective of any context.

Meanwhile, Israelis, both Jewish and Arab, are being viciously maimed and murdered in an effort to terrorize a country that was working toward Palestinian statehood. To listen to public figures rationalizing such slaughter, even under the guise of sympathy for the Palestinians, is appalling.

To reiterate why this position is morally repulsive: In signing the Oslo accords (1993), the Palestinians endorsed UN Security Council Resolutions 242 and 338, which underlie the entire Middle East peace process. Resolution 338 binds the parties to negotiate a resolution of their differences. Resolution 242 sets out a framework for a just and lasting peace in the region. The formula is "land for peace," which also means "if peace, then land." This was the process Israel and the Palestinians participated in until Arafat rejected his own written commitments to negotiate, to renounce violence and to fight terrorism.

There is absolutely no justification either in international law (such as the UN resolutions) or in the Palestinian commitments at Oslo to countenance the use of violence against Israelis.

When political leaders, writers and other intellectuals rationalize suicide bombings, they are unwittingly (or, in the case of a few, perhaps consciously) complicit in the murder of innocent people. In giving succour to the perpetrators of heinous crimes, they insult the historical and diplomatic record, as well as morality itself.

Paul Michaels is the director of communications of the Canada-Israel Committee.

HELPING MDA: Beit Rayim Synagogue and Adath Sholom Synagogue, who are in the process of merging and will be building Vaughan's first Conservative synagogue, raised almost $50,000 for the Magen David Adom fund in support of Israel. Many changes in store for U of T students this fall

By JEFF BERCUSON
Special to The CJN

With September looming, thousands of university students are preparing to return to the familiarities of campus life. But for the Jewish students of the University of Toronto, there will be some major changes.

In anticipation of the opening of the Wolfond Centre for Jewish Campus Life in September 2003, the campus's Jewish organization is undergoing changes to accommodate the expected increase in both activities and participation that comes with a new facility.

Located at the corner of Harbord and Huron streets, right in the heart of the university, the centre will be the 12,000-square-foot hub of Jewish life on campus.

"The Wolfond Centre is going to be a great place for students to meet, to socialize and to learn," says its director Lisa Isen Baumal.

The building will contain lounges, a resource centre, offices for staff and a multipurpose basement for Shabbat dinners and other social events, as well as what Baumal described as a "spiritual room."

The former location of the Jewish Students' Union (JSU), in the basement of U of T's University College, was a major deterrent for students who wanted to get involved.

"The Wolfond Centre will [have] a much stronger, much more visible presence on campus," says Pearl Gropper Berman, assistant executive director of Jewish Campus Services of Greater Toronto (JCS), whose office will be moved to the new location. "Students will no longer feel scared or intimidated to get involved."

In addition to the location changes, the structure of the student-run organization is undergoing reform. What was once the JSU is now called Hillel, a difference that entails more than just a name change. In becoming affiliated with Hillel: The Foundation for Jewish Campus Life, the former JSU will have access to marketing, scholarship and grant money, as well as the recognition that the well-known international organization's name brings, says Gropper Berman.

"Eventually, all the Toronto campus organizations will be part of Hillel," she says.

The Wolfond Centre for Jewish Campus Life, scheduled to open in Sept. 2003, will serve the University of Toronto's Jewish student community.

"Hillel will be much more representative of the interests of the students of U of T," adds Isen Baumal. "Hillel actively seeks to engage diverse Jewish students on their own terms and to provide them with opportunities that are meaningful and appealing to them."

Hillel will operate as a student organization made up of student-led, independently-run groups that are interest-based, faculty-based or religion-based, such as the Arts Collective and the Athletics Association.

In the past, an executive committee of five students made the majority of JSU decisions. Under the new structure, however, a five-member student co-ordinating committee will work directly with the representatives of the new, smaller groups within Hillel.

"We've implemented a whole new leadership structure," says Baumal. "The changes are going to make Jewish student life at U of T much more diverse and inclusive.

"Having a range of diverse Jewish student groups on campus will create numerous opportunities for students to participate actively or take a leadership role in both the university and local community. If students haven't found their niche on campus, Hillel provides the opportunity to create it."

When asked what prompted these structural changes, besides the impending opening of the Wolfond Centre, Baumal says the five-member executive wasn't able to coordinate a large enough number of activities for the growing number of Jewish students wanting to get involved in Jewish campus life.

Isen Baumal adds, "We just grew out of the JSU. The old structure was far too small and club-like, and the JSU had become much more than a club. Both the students and the executive decided that it was time for a change."

The major focus of Hillel this year will be the current conflict in Israel, she says.

"Israel is really at the top of everybody's mind. Our number-one goal this year is to continue to educate people about the situation and create more student advocates to provide additional support."

Currently, Hillel is planning an Israel Advocacy Retreat in October for more than 100 students. As well, there are plans to send a group of students to the Jewish state for a leadership conference in December.

In addition, Tzedek Hillel, an initiative dedicated to social action and justice activities supporting Israel, will organize events in the local Jewish community.

"This initiative will encourage students to volunteer and get more involved in the community," says Baumal. "Tzedek Hillel programs are scheduled to include literacy programs, preparing sandwiches for the underprivileged, clothing drives and food drives."

And like last year, Hillel also plans to send students to El Salvador, where they will help members of small communities rebuild their lives after the devastating earthquake that occured there in January 2001.

But for now, Hillel is working to raise awareness of the recent changes and of upcoming events.

"Right now, we are just focusing on putting our name out there," says Baumal, who is currently planning a welcome back barbecue, as well as the first Shabbat dinner of the year. Last year, 200 students attended the year's first Shabbat dinner, a number Baumal is confident will be surpassed this year.

As the largest mental health and addictions facility in Canada and a teaching hospital fully affiliated with the University of Toronto, the Centre for Addiction and Mental Health works to create a better life for the one in four Canadians whose lives are affected by mental illness and addiction. The Centre for Addiction and Mental Health Foundation – a team of seasoned fundraising professionals and volunteer leaders – raises funds in support of the work of the Centre. As the Foundation prepares to undertake a $50 million+ capital campaign in support of the expansion and redevelopment of the Centre, a dedicated professional is now required for the following role.

Centre for Addiction and Mental Health Foundation

Development Officer, Major Gifts

In this integral position, you will manage the identification, cultivation, solicitation and stewardship activities of corporate, foundation and individual major gift prospects in order to secure gifts ranging from $10,000 to $100,000. You will be expected to build on the program's previous successes of the Foundation's Centred on Hope Campaign, broadening the base of major gift support and actively participating in the upcoming capital campaign. Along with a post-secondary education, you must have at least 3 years of experience in a fundraising environment, preferably with exposure to major giving activities. You bring a sound knowledge of donor stewardship and fundraising principles, computer proficiency, and the ability to meet competing deadlines. A team player, you possess excellent volunteer-management, communication and organizational skills. Ideally, you are a member of a professional organization such as AFP and AHP, and have a background with Raisers' Edge.

If you are interested in joining our team of professionals, please forward your resume with a cover letter, stating your salary expectations, quoting File #02, by September 22, 2002, to: Centre for Addiction and Mental Health, Human Resources, 1001 Queen Street West, Toronto, Ontario, M6J 1H4. Toronto surgeon, researcher Cohen to be honoured

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

Toronto surgeon and researcher Zane Cohen is being honoured by the Toronto chapter of the Canadian Associates of Ben-Gurion University of the Negev (BGU) and Mount Sinai Hospital.

Cohen, 58, is surgeon in chief at Mount Sinai Hospital, a professor in the department of surgery at the University of Toronto and chair of the university's division of general surgery.

He will be presented with the Negev Award at a dinner Sept. 18, 6:30 p.m., at the Sheraton Centre Grand Ballroom.

Mount Sinai will present Cohen with a certificate linking his name to the Surgical Same Day Admitting Unit. A new service to be located on the same floor as the operating rooms, it will streamline the admission process for patients coming to the hospital for same-day surgical procedures.

The keynote speaker at the dinner will be Nobel laureate Elie Wiesel.

A number of colorectal surgeons from BGU have been trained by Cohen, and there are plans for medical students from the university to come and train under him.

As well, Cohen will lecture periodically at BGU and demonstrate his surgical skills at the university's school of medicine.

He is responsible for bringing the Koch Pouch to Canada, which has proven highly effective in the treatment of colitis. Mount Sinai is now the third largest centre for this technology in the world.

Cohen is the child of immigrants, who, he told The CJN, wanted him to be a "doctor, a dentist, a lawyer or an accountant."

He chose to specialize in surgery, rather than his other choice, obstetrics and gynecology, he said, because "it was more exciting."

His opinion hasn't changed. "I don't have a single regret. There is no field like it, where you hold lives in your hands.

"It's hard work – but so rewarding."

While best known for his work in colorectal surgery, he said he really enjoys teaching, not just medical interns and residents, but undergraduates in the University of Toronto, medical personnel throughout the province and from out of the country, surgical residents and fellows and observers.

Cohen is concerned about the current method of medical education, which he described as "a problem-based learning curriculum," taken from a model set by Harvard University. It is supposed to encourage independent thinking and study.

However, he said, students still want to be spoonfed their medical knowledge, rather than doing the questioning and searching for answers that the method calls for. "This doesn't turn out worse doctors than before – but it doesn't produce better ones, either."

Dr. Zane Cohen

Education for surgeons is also a concern. First, he said, you can be a surgeon for 30 years without being required to be recertified. Also, because surgeons are so busy, and because there are fewer nurses and anesthetists to lessen some of the burden, "we can't afford the time to fully teach the residents."

For these reasons, he said, it makes sense to use simulators and dry labs to teach, especially, basics like knots and the proper use of surgical instruments and techniques. These new teaching methods, Cohen said, are a more efficient use of time.

Cohen called the Ontario government "shortsighted." Their restructuring policies, he charged, have led to "fewer doctors, especially anesthetists; little action on loosening regulations for immigrant physicians; fewer nurses; operating rooms that are not at full strength."

New technologies, such as the PET (Position Emission Technology) scan, which offers highly sensitive diagnoses, are not made available until long after they are proved safe and effective, and then only in very limited supply. (The only PET scan machine in Ontario, he said, is at McMaster University in Hamilton.)

"If there is not more money put into the health-care system or the government allows privatization," he warned, "access to health care will be more and more difficult."

While Cohen said he could understand the government giving more money to peripheral hospitals, "the downtown hospitals are where discoveries are made, due to their relationship with universities; the communities that are served have often more complex needs; and the cost per case is higher because they are teaching hospitals."

Cohen balances his surgical and administrative time with outside activities – arts: attending cultural events, such as the National Ballet; sports: "Some other doctors and I have season's tickets for baseball and hockey!"); going to the family cottage at Jackson's Point, and maintaining close family ties.

Conflict with PA a strategic threat: IDF chief

Palestinian terror seen as greater problem than Iraq or Hezbollah

By YAIR SHELEG
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — IDF Chief of Staff Moshe Ya'alon views the conflict with the Palestinians as one of the two main strategic threats to Israel, along with the prospect of a hostile country attaining nuclear weapons.

Ya'alon said Sunday that Israel must win the current conflict with the Palestinians, since such a victory would make it clear to the Palestinians that they cannot attain political goals by using terror, he said.

Ya'alon, speaking at a conference organized in Jerusalem by the Chief Rabbinate ahead of the coming High Holy Days, downplayed the threat posed by Iraq or Hezbollah compared to the problem of Palestinian terror and the danger caused by nuclear proliferation.

"In the long term, the threat posed by Iraq or Hezbollah doesn't make me lose sleep," Ya'alon said. "What does cost me sleep are two things: first, the prospect of a hostile country attaining nuclear capability and altering the strategic balance; and, second, the Palestinian issue."

He added: "If we don't make clear to ourselves that we must win this war [against the Palestinians], we'll find ourselves facing a cancerous threat."

Ya'alon added that when he headed military intelligence in 1995 he raised questions about the Palestinian Authority (PA). Questions he brought up then concerning the PA's possible reliance on terror have in the past two years become emphatic truths, he said.

The chief of staff said the Palestinians launched a war against Israel in 2000 when they grasped that the dispute was headed toward a diplomatic resolution and rather than choosing compromise, they initiated terror and violence.

The intifadah is not a popular uprising, as some would have Israel and the world believe, Ya'alon stressed. Rather, it is a war controlled by the PA leadership, with PA officials determining its tactics and norms.

The PA's recourse to terror reflects the Palestinian leadership's unwillingness to accept Israel as a state in the region, Ya'alon said.

Some Palestinian leaders believed that Israel would break down at a much earlier stage of the intifadah, Ya'alon said. These Palestinians believed that Israel could not endure 600 fatalities and serious economic damage. In reality, Israel has overcome setbacks, and must continue to do so, he declared.

Should the conflict end with the Palestinians believing that terror serves their ends, "we'll find ourselves on a slippery slope in terms of our deterrent capabilities, in relations with Arab states and with Arabs in Israel."

In what appears to be a slap in the face to PA Interior Minister Abdel Raziq Yehiyeh, the joint intifadah leadership called on the PA on Sunday to stop its security talks with Israeli officials.

A statement issued after a series of meetings between Yehiyeh and opposition groups said the intifadah leadership supports the continuation of the struggle against Israel and objects to the "Gaza and Bethlehem First" plan – in which the PA agreed to crack down on terror in exchange for a partial Israeli withdrawal from Palestinian-controlled areas – and other partial solutions offered by Israel.

Yehiyeh published a statement earlier Sunday detailing his efforts to get various militant groups to abandon the use of violence.

During a meeting last week, Yehiyeh stressed the importance of the security agreement in order to remove Israeli troops from Palestinian towns, he said.

"I asserted the need to reassess and revise accordingly the strategy of resistance and to review its presently adopted forms so as to comply with international norms and international legitimacy," Yehiyeh said in the statement.

Chief rabbis call for revision to Law of Return

By MAZAL MUALEM and ALUF BENN
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Israel's leading Jewish authorities, Sephardi Chief Rabbi Eliyahu Bakshi-Doron and his Ashkenazi counterpart Yisrael Meir Lau, called Sunday for an urgent revision to be made to the Law of Return, Army Radio reported.

Speaking at the end of the annual convention of rabbis in Jerusalem, the two warned that "70 per cent of the new immigrants to Israel are professed non-Jews, with no connection to Judaism. We cannot continue to bring entire Christian families to Israel."

The Law of Return, passed in 1950, states that every Jew has the right to come to Israel as an immigrant. New immigrants to Israel receive a range of benefits designed to facilitate their integration into society, including Hebrew lessons, subsidized housing and health care.

According to figures released last week by the Interior Ministry, some two-thirds of the immigrants to Israel from the former Soviet Union (FSU) since the beginning of the year are not Jewish.

Interior Minister Eli Yishai said the figures were a serious matter and testified to the need for an immediate change to the Law of Return. To date, Yishai, from the haredi Shas Party, has been unsuccessful in his efforts to change the law. Last June, it appeared that the law might be modified after a committee of cabinet ministers approved a change proposed by MK Michael Kleiner (Herut). But Kleiner's proposal was effectively buried after then-Housing Minister Natan Sharansky appealed the ministers' decision to the cabinet, which annulled it.

Under the Law of Return, the spouses of Jews, their children and their grandchildren are all entitled to immigrate to Israel, receive citizenship and various benefits, even if they are not considered Jews under Jewish law.

Under Kleiner's amendment, a person whose grandparent is Jewish would be eligible for rights provided by the Law of Return only if he immigrates to Israel together with the grandparent. In a situation in which the Jewish grandparent is dead, the grandchild would have to prove that he was persecuted because of his Jewish ancestry.

At the time of the amendment, Sharansky said parties with particular interests were spreading lies that most of the immigrants are non-Jews, when in fact only six percent are not Jewish. Yishai responded by promising to continue his efforts to change the law, claiming that it paradoxically is undoing Israel's Jewish identity while it is meant to do exactly the opposite.

Interior Ministry officials said the figures include all immigrants who received visas to come to Israel based on the Law of Return.

The Week in Israel

Aug. 19

• Hebrew University researchers announced they have developed a technique that could prevent the spread of cancer cells. It involves engineering a virus that induces cancer cells to destroy themselves. The researchers are trying to adapt the technique against lymphoma and leukemia.

Aug. 20

• Former prime minister Ehud Barak appeared before the commission looking into the rioting in northern Israel in October 2000 in which 13 Israeli Arabs died. Barak, who created the commission, testified a "separatist Arab group with nationalist political demands" launched the violence.

Aug. 21

• A day after Israeli troops withdrew from Bethlehem, its mayor called for a peaceful struggle against Israel. Mayor Hanna Nassar said the Palestinian people had made a mistake by using weapons in the current intifadah.

Aug. 22

• The army prevented three armed Palestinians from infiltrating Kfar Darom in Gaza . A caller to Associated Press claimed responsibility on behalf of the Al Aqsa Martyrs Brigade, a branch of Palestinian Authority President Yasser Arafat's Fatah faction.

Aug. 23

• The unemployment rate fell in the second quarter of the year, from 10.6 per cent to 10.3 per cent, according to the Central Bureau of Statistics. The number of jobless people fell from 268,500 in the first quarter to 260,500. But officials said the drop fails to reflect a change in the employment situation, saying it was due mainly to an increase in the number of people called up for army reserve duty and an increase in the number of private security guards.

Jews optimistic as UN summit opens

By MICHAEL BELLING
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

CAPE TOWN — Jewish participants have been bracing themselves for the opening of the World Summit on Sustainable Development, worried that the conference could turn into another forum for anti-Semitism like last year's UN anti-racism conference.

But on the eve of the conference in Johannesburg, which begins Monday and runs through Sept. 4, some Jewish leaders here are optimistic that it will remain focused on the issue of balancing respect for the environment with the need for economic development.

Russell Gaddin, national chair of the South African Jewish Board of Deputies, which has led the local Jewish lobby in preparing for the summit, said: "We do know that the anti-Israel lobby is going to be here and is going to endeavour to promote their anti-Israel propaganda.

"But I believe we have done enough network building to ensure they do not hijack the conference."

The South African government was determined to make sure the conference dealt with the issues that are supposed to be the summit's focus, Gaddin said, "particularly after they came to understand what a disaster the Durban racism conference was."

The United States and Israel stormed out of last year's conference in Durban, South Africa, condemning it as a circus of anti-Semitism, after language was debated that would have rehabilitated the 1975 UN resolution denigrating Zionism as racism, and after thousands thronged in protest of Israel, with some distributing anti-Semitic cartoons and taunting that Hitler never finished the job.

Focus expected to remain on the environment

This year's summit will start with a gathering of non-governmental organizations, followed by the governmental summit.

More than 100 heads of state and government are expected to attend. Several countries have expressed their disappointment that the United States delegation is being led by Secretary of State Colin Powell, and not by President George W. Bush.

In contrast to the racism conference, there has been no major emphasis on anti-Israel resolutions during preparatory meetings, although four allegations were made against Israel in debates, relating to toxic waste dumps, the destruction of olive trees, "stealing water" and preventing sustainable development.

Jewish groups, who admit they were caught by surprise by the virulence of the anti-Israel and anti-Semitic campaign at Durban, worked to make sure that the Johannesburg conference would not be hijacked by Arab and pro-Palestinian groups.

But the final preparatory document in June left the door open for the Israeli-Palestinian conflict.

Although the parties were not mentioned by name, "foreign occupation" was listed among "worldwide conditions that pose severe threats to sustainable development."

Some prominent Africans, including South Africa's deputy foreign minister Aziz Pahad, believe that any overemphasis on the conflict, as happened at Durban, detracts from the Palestinian cause.

"We will always defend the right of the Palestinian people, but you can't have every conference dominated by the issue," he said earlier this month.

Gaddin regards the summit "not as a threat, but as an opportunity to showcase what Jews and Israel are doing for sustainable development worldwide."

This has led to a proactive strategy, focusing largely on Israel's contributions to sustainable development.

Keren Kayemeth Leisrael-Jewish National Fund, Israel's largest environmental organization, has sent a substantial delegation and is sharing research findings in the fields of forestation, desert rehabilitation, land development, water recycling and agricultural innovations.

Optimistic about the event, Jewish activists point to several differences between this year's meeting and Durban, saying that the conference in Johannesburg has a different agenda, is much larger and has had a lack of public demonstrations before the summit.

Israel sent only a low-level delegation to Durban, but this time it will be represented by two Cabinet members, Foreign Minister Shimon Peres and Environment Minister Tzachi Hanegbi.

Canada, Germany set to sign pension pact

Few German Jews who had lived outside Germany returned to the country after the war and, in effect, were excluded under the pension rules.

However, the governments of Israel and the United States campaigned to have the special circumstances of Jews recognized and in 1992, the law was amended to include eastern European Jews of German descent. In 1995, the law was further amended to include Jews not living in Germany.

Alerted to the situation by Endre Altmann, a Canadian citizen who emigrated from Romania in 1988, Canadian Jewish Congress began a long lobbying effort to include Canadian Jews in the pension plan. Canadian and German officials proved receptive to the idea and, once various bureaucratic hurdles were overcome, the signing ceremony resulted.

To be eligible, pensioners must be a Jew of German ancestry born before Sept. 1, 1925. They must also have been a Canadian resident prior to July 1, 1990.

Since the pension reforms were implemented, only about 200 American Jews have qualified, said Ron Singer, director of public affairs for Congress.

Altmann said he expects to receive a lump sum, retroactive payment of tens of thousands of dollars. "It means I would be able to help my grandchildren," he said. "It would be a great help to support them in their university years."

Altmann, who worked as an engineer in the food processing industry, said his family traces its roots in Romania to a German colonization under the Habsburg Empire in the 18th century.

Florida man arrested for planning to attack Muslims

By SHLOMO SHAMIR
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

ST. PETERSBURG, Fla. — A Florida podiatrist, Dr. Robert Goldstein, 37, was arrested Friday on suspicion of planning to bomb mosques and Islamic centres in St. Petersburg.

Agents of the U.S. Treasury Department's Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco and Firearms (ATF) raided Goldstein's home in the suburb of Seminole, near St. Petersburg, after the suspect's mother called police, requesting a security check at her son's home. She was concerned over a fight Goldstein had with his wife Kristi.

At the home, which was rigged with trip wires and closed circuit cameras, the agents discovered what they described as "enough explosives to destroy the 200-unit townhouse complex."

In a Tampa court, Goldstein was charged with possession of a non-registered destructive device and attempting to use an explosive to damage and destroy Islamic centres. He continues to be held without bond at the Hillsborough County Jail.

In the Goldstein home, agents found a typed list of approximately 50 Islamic places of worship in the Tampa-St. Petersburg area and other Florida locations.

The operation at Goldstein's home began with an effort to coax him outside. Thirty minutes later he was placed in custody under the Baker Act, which allows involuntary commitment for psychiatric evaluation.

In the home the police found explosive devices, grenades and a 20-litre gasoline bomb with a timer and a wire attached to it.

They also found a cache of weapons, including .50-calibre machine-guns and sniper rifles. Goldstein had licences for the guns and no criminal record, according to a local detective.

Police said they also found an 11-point plan for attacking an Islamic education centre. The plan outlined details including what Goldstein would wear, how he could get rid of fingerprints and how he would engage in hand-to-hand combat if necessary.

"Set timers for approximately 15-20 minutes to allow for enough time to get out of area, but to confirm explosion has... been successful," the outline said, according to authorities. "The amount of explosives should be ample to take down the building[s]," they said.

Jerusalem terror cell implicated in major attacks

By NAOMI SEGAL
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

JERUSALEM — The recent capture of a Hamas cell in eastern Jerusalem believed responsible for a series of devastating terrorist attacks was a major coup for Israel's security forces – but it underscored the challenge Israel faces in fighting terrorism when the perpetrators may come from within.

Israelis reacted with shock and consternation to the fact the four cell members from eastern Jerusalem used their Israeli identity cards, places of employment and freedom of movement to carry out some of the most devastating attacks of the current Palestinian intifadah, killing 35 people and wounded dozens.

Among the attacks attributed to the cell were the July 31 bombing at Hebrew University that killed nine people, including five Americans.

The cell also is believed to have carried out the March suicide bombing at Jerusalem's Moment Cafe, and a suicide bombing at a Rishon Lezion pool hall in May.

The cell also tried, on two occasions to derail Israeli trains by planting bombs on the tracks near Lod. They also planted two bombs on fuel tankers, one of which blew up beneath a tanker at the country's largest depot, Pi Glilot.

The Pi Glilot attack, which because of a series of coincidences caused no injuries, raised Israeli fears of a "mega-terror" attack that could cause thousands of casualties.

Deputy Public Security Minister Gideon Ezra said the capture of eastern Jerusalem residents at the core of a terrorist cell completely shattered the left's claim that terrorists were driven by economic hardship, hunger and poverty.

"These people had it made from every aspect," Ezra wrote in the Israeli daily Ma'ariv. "They did not live under closure or blockade. They enjoyed a good living, freedom of movement throughout the country. Despite this, they turned murder into an industry that coldly killed 35 Israelis and was always looking for the next murderous attack.

"All of this proves that hardship" is not "what pushes the Palestinian murderers, but vast hate, cultivated by religious leaders and the Palestinian Authority," Ezra wrote.

Interior Minister Eli Yishai said he was taking steps to revoke the permanent residency status of the four Jerusalemites.

As a first step, Yishai asked the state attorney's office and the Shin Bet security service to provide him with material showing that the four had been involved in terrorist activities.

Yishai has already begun proceedings to revoke the citizenship of two Israeli Arabs suspected of terrorist activity. The interior minister, who has been criticized for what some considered an extreme move, said it is the only way to deter terrorists who are Israelis or live in Israel from exploiting their status to harm the state.

"We are in the midst of a war, and we are obliged to protect ourselves," Yishai said last Thursday.

Unlike Israeli Arabs, residents of eastern Jerusalem are not Israeli citizens. They can vote in Jerusalem municipal elections – though most choose not to, so as not to legitimize Israeli rule, and because of threats from Palestinian leaders – but they cannot vote in elections for the Knesset.

Since the signing of the 1993 Oslo accords, they can vote in Palestinian elections.

Jerusalem Mayor Ehud Olmert, who has taken pride in the fact that eastern Jerusalem residents for the most part have refrained from violent activity during the intifadah, expressed shock at the existence of the cell.

"This is something I feared," Olmert said.

In addition to the four eastern Jerusalem residents, Israeli security forces arrested a cell member near Ramallah.

Security forces said the cell's commanders in Ramallah received their instructions from Damascus. Israeli security forces said the cell apparently was planning "mega-attacks" against Israel.

The men were captured last week on Saturday night by Israeli security forces, who thwarted an attempt to carry out an attack in central Israel. Last Tuesday, Israeli experts recovered the bomb the cell had intended to use in the attack, which they had hidden near the entrance to Jerusalem.

At least eight major attacks were attributed to the group. They include the July 31 bombing at Hebrew University's Frank Sinatra cafeteria. Nine people were killed, among them five Americans, and more than 80 were wounded.

According to reports, one cell member jumped the fence of the university the night before the attack and hid the bomb behind a bush. The next day, Mohammed Odeh, who worked as a painter for a contractor doing renovations on the campus, showed up for work. He picked up the bomb from its hiding place, took it to the cafeteria, put it in on a table and covered it with a newspaper. He then left the campus and detonated the bomb by remote control from a cell phone.

The day after the attack, Odeh reported to work to repaint the scorched walls of the cafeteria.

A French foreign student wounded in the cafeteria bombing said he felt only slightly relieved by the capture of the cell responsible for the attack.

"If I understand the news correctly, it is only the tip of the iceberg. It is scary that there are terrorist cells prepared to do everything to hurt us," the daily Ma'ariv quoted him as saying.

American Jewish organizations demanded that the cell members be extradited to the United States to face trial.

Syrians say they would consider border changes

Middle East officials, policy-makers meet for closed-door conference

By SHARON SADEH
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

LONDON — A closed-door conference of opinion makers and officials from the Middle East – including Israelis, Syrians, and Palestinians – heard surprising readiness on the part of the Syrians to discuss border modifications in any peace deal with Israel involving a return of the Golan Heights.

In addition, one of British Prime Minister Tony Blair's closest advisers, MP Peter Mandelson, said the lines of a final peace deal between Israel and the Palestinians are well-known to all and that the mutual bloodshed will not change them, even if the violence continues for years to come. He said an international force, led by the Americans, not the United Nations, might be necessary to guarantee a ceasefire that could corral both sides into negotiations.

Mandelson, who as Secretary for Northern Ireland was involved in the peace negotiations there, said Israel and the Palestinians are closer to a final accord than the Irish, since the Irish agreed to postpone a final agreement until a plebiscite is held. Meanwhile, the sides are proceeding through an interim agreement.

With the outlines of a final deal between Israel and the Palestinians almost certain to resemble the Taba and Clinton plans, the conflict in the Middle East is much closer to a solution than the violence would suggest, he said.

The conference was organized by the Next Century Foundation, among whose founders is former PLO treasurer Jaweed al Ghussein, and whose advisory board includes both Arab and Jewish businessmen.

Attending the conference – dubbed "Beyond the Boundaries" and described as "a confidential meeting between opinion formers to search for a rationale amongst the various plans and options currently in circulation in the Middle East" – were private and public officials from all sides in the region. The meeting's agenda was to "discuss the plethora of peace plans that are currently in circulation and find a viable thread."

Among the Israelis attending was Oded Ben Haim, director of Palestinian affairs in the Foreign Ministry, and Prof. Itzhak Galnoor, a former head of the Civil Service Commission.

On the Palestinian side, a minor flap erupted when the Palestinian Authority (PA) representative, Jihad al Wazir, cancelled his attendance because of the presence of several Palestinian opposition figures who have long been seeking the removal of PA President Yasser Arafat.

These included Tawfiq al Ghussein, son of the former PLO treasurer, who is running as an independent candidate against Arafat for the PA presidency. However, Bassam Abu Sharif, a former spokesperson for the PFLP and now an adviser to Arafat, showed up.

Most surprising among the 40 delegates to the conference were the Syrian representatives, Fawaz Akhras, father-in-law of Syrian President Bashar Assad, and Ghayth Armanazi, a former Arab League ambassador and former head of the Arab Bankers Association. Organizers believe the two attended with full knowledge and approval of the uppermost echelons of the Syrian government.

Armanazi said Syria disapproves of ending the conflict with a series of separate agreements, and believes that the peace process should continue along the lines of the regional negotiations according to the Madrid Conference. He said the Oslo process failed because Syria was opposed to it.

Turning to the Israeli-Syrian dispute, however, the Syrian surprised the audience when he said that if necessary, Syria would consider border corrections in an agreement with Israel over the Golan Heights. So far, Syria has insisted on Israel returning to pre-1967 borders.

But the speaker insisted that for Syria to reach an agreement, Israel has to clarify what it regards as the final line of withdrawal and stop using ambiguous statements such as "the depth of withdrawal will equal the depth of peace," a phrase the late prime minister Yitzhak Rabin often used to explain his position on the Golan Heights.

In addition to the outlines of a final Israeli-Palestinian deal and the dispute with Syria, the participants also discussed "100 commercial projects for the area that could be implemented immediately," if a political settlement is reached. Jerusalem and the fate of the holy sites was also on the agenda.

Follow commandments and be sated

By RIVKA TAL
Special to The CJN

Rivka Tal, a freelance writer living in Israel, sent along her family's Rosh Hashanah menu:

Rosh Hashanah, the Jewish New Year, is a two-day holiday, and many people follow the commandment to eat two festive meals on each day.

It's a time when family and friends get together to wish each other a good, sweet year. So not surprisingly, the meals favour our sweet tooth. Challahs for these meals are traditionally round to symbolize the cycle of the year.

Another tradition is to avoid the use of any nuts on Rosh Hashanah. Our first night meal will look something like this. Although it may seem to be excessive, none of us will forego chicken soup at any Shabbat or holiday meal. The Tuna Pinwheels are a bit of an effort, but definitely worth it.

Since many people are not partial to honey cake, we serve honey cookies instead.

Recipes for items marked with a * are included below.

May the entire Jewish people be inscribed for a good, sweet year!

*Tuna Pinwheels
Chicken Soup
*Honey-Mustard Chicken
Green Salad
Mashed Potato Kugel
*Carrot Tsimmes
Fruit Compote
*Honey Cookies

TUNA PINWHEELS

Tuna Pinwheels may be served as is, or topped with dollops of mushroom sauce for an elegant presentation.

3½ cups flour, sifted
½ tsp. salt
1¾ cup unsalted margarine
6 to 8 tbsp. ice water
1 can artichoke bottoms (optional)
2 6½-oz. cans tuna, well-drained
2 eggs
½ tsp. onion soup powder (optional)
⅓ cup matzah meal
salt and pepper to taste
1 egg yolk, beaten

Prepare pastry: Combine flour and salt in a medium bowl. Cut in margarine with a pastry blender or two knives until crumbly.

Sprinkle ice water, 1 tbsp. at a time, evenly over surface. Stir with a fork until dry ingredients are moistened. (After adding 6 tbsp. ice water, squeeze dough firmly between your fingers. If it falls apart, add remaining water.)

Divide dough in half and form each into a flattened disk; wrap with plastic wrap. Freeze for half an hour or chill for 2 hours. Let stand at room temperature 5 minutes.

Quarter well-drained artichokes and place in food processor. Buzz briefly. Add tuna, eggs, nuts, soup powder, matzah meal, salt and pepper and combine thoroughly.

Preheat oven to 375. Line a baking sheet with parchment paper. Roll out one pastry disk on a floured surface to ⅛-inch thickness, about 13 x 9 inches. Spread filling evenly over dough and roll up tightly. Pinch to seal; fold ends under loaf. Place on parchment-lined sheet. Repeat with remaining dough.

Mix egg yolk with 1 tsp. water and brush over prepared rolls. Sprinkle with sesame seeds. Score with a sharp knife at ¾-inch intervals. Bake for about 45 minutes or until golden. Slice and serve. Yield: 2 rolls of 8-10 servings.

CARROT TSIMMES
(includes no fat)

non-stick cooking spray
2 medium sweet potatoes
3 cooking apples (Golden Delicious or Rome Beauty)
3 medium carrots
1 cup pitted prunes
¼ cup orange juice
2 tbsp. grated orange rind
¼ cup honey
¼ tsp. ground cloves

Coat a 13 x 9-inch decorative bake-and-serve casserole with non-stick cooking spray. Peel sweet potatoes and slice into thin slices. Peel and core apples. Scrape carrots. Slice apples and carrots into thin slices. Cut prunes in half, using wet kitchen shears.

Layer sweet potatoes, apples, carrots and prunes in overlapping circles in the prepared baking dish. Combine orange juice, orange rind, honey and cloves and pour over mixture.

Cover. Bake for approximately 1½ hours or until thoroughly cooked. Serve hot.

CHICKEN IN HONEY MUSTARD MARINADE

¼ cup honey
¼ cup soy sauce
¼ cup prepared mustard
¼ cup dry white wine
1 tbsp. grated orange rind
1 clove minced garlic
1 2½-3 lb. chicken, cut into eighths

Combine all ingredients except chicken in a large bowl. Put chicken into the mixture and cover. Chill in the refrigerator 6 to 8 hours or overnight, turning over pieces once, if possible.

Preheat oven to 325. Lightly grease a medium baking dish. Place marinated chicken in the prepared baking dish. Bake in the preheated oven 1-1½ hours, or until meat is no longer pink and juices run clear.

HONEY COOKIES

3 eggs
¼ cup sugar
⅓ cup vegetable oil
1 cup honey
4 cups flour
1 tsp. baking powder
1 tsp. cinnamon
powdered sugar

Preheat oven to 325. Beat eggs together with sugar. Add oil and honey and beat in well. (If honey is too thick, it may be softened by microwaving at full power for 45 seconds. Be sure to remove the top of the jar. If the jar is plastic, microwave for only 20-30 seconds. Be careful: jar and honey may become very hot!) Set aside.

Sift flour. Stir in baking powder and cinnamon. Combine with the first mixture, mixing just enough to thoroughly incorporate ingredients.

Cover cookie sheets with aluminum foil. With your hands, form balls about 1½ inches in diameter. Place on cookie sheets, 2 inches apart. (If dough is too sticky to handle, wet hands slightly before forming the balls.) Bake for 12-15 minutes until golden brown around edges. Remove from cookie sheets and dust with powdered sugar. Yield: 4 dozen cookies.

Here is a sample of this year's Rosh Hashanah recipes.

HEARTY VEGETABLE SOUP
Pareve

A great way to use leftover vegetables, your garden vegetables or canned vegetables. Just replace a can of vegetables in the ingredient list with approximately 2 cups of your leftovers or vary the vegetables. Prepare a day or two in advance to blend the flavours and the taste is better.

2 19-oz. cans Italian stewed tomatoes
4 cups water
1 19-oz. can chick peas, drained and rinsed
1 14-oz. can cut green beans, drained and rinsed
1 14-oz. can green peas, drained and rinsed
3 potatoes, peeled and diced
1 medium onion, diced
2 carrots, peeled and chopped
¼ cup rice
⅛ tsp. black pepper
⅛ tsp. red pepper flakes
½ tsp. salt
½ tsp. garlic powder

Bring the tomatoes and water to a simmer. Add the remaining ingredients. Cover and continue cooking for 60 minutes to allow flavours to blend. Serves 10-12.

Variation: Use any canned vegetables you prefer. Corn or kidney beans work well. Serves 4.

GLAZED VIDALIA ONIONS

Glaze:
1 cup dry kosher red wine
2 tbsp. sugar
1 tsp. dried rosemary
1 tbsp. lemon juice
⅛ tsp. ground cloves
⅛ tsp. black pepper

2 medium Vidalia or other sweet onions cooking spray
2 tsp. olive oil

Preheat oven to 400. Combine the first 6 ingredients in a small saucepan; bring to a boil. Reduce heat to medium; cook, uncovered, until reduced to ½ cup (about 10 minutes). Set aside. Cut the onions lengthwise in half. Place cut sides down in a small baking dish coated with cooking spray. Drizzle olive oil over onions. Cover and bake for 25 minutes. Uncover and bake 20 minutes more. Remove from oven. Turn over and pour the wine mixture over the onions. Bake an additional 20 minutes or until onions are tender, basting every 5 minutes. Serve ½ onion with 1 tbsp. glaze per serving.

MOROCCAN CHICKEN
A dark succulent dish

4 tbsp. oil
2 cups sliced onions
1 cup raisins
1 cup pitted prunes, halved
1 cup almonds, blanched, peeled and toasted
2 cups cooked or roasted chicken, cut in strips
1 tsp. salt
¼ tsp. pepper
¾ cup orange juice

Preheat oven to 350. Heat oil and fry onions until soft and dark brown. Add raisins, prunes and almonds. Simmer covered, on a very low heat for 15 minutes. Add chicken strips, salt, pepper and orange juice. Place in covered casserole and bake for 1 hour. The juices will evaporate and the dish should be dark brown and very soft. Serves 4.

SUPERB RICE MOLD

Part 1
2 cups brown rice
2 tbsp. oil
salt and pepper to taste

Put rice in a large pot of boiling salted water and cook for 30 minutes. Drain and rinse with warm water. Place in a baking dish. Add oil, salt and pepper to taste. Dry in a 200-degree oven for 30 minutes, stirring occasionally with a fork.

Part 2
While rice is cooking, prepare vinaigrette in a jar or food processor.
1½ tsp. dried basil
1½ tsp. dried tarragon
1 tsp. Dijon mustard
¼ cup vinegar
¾ cup oil
salt and pepper to taste

Part 3
½ cup toasted slivered almonds
½ cup fresh green peas
1 bunch green onions, thinly sliced
½ cup black olives, sliced
¼ cup chopped flat leaf parsley
½ can cut hearts of palm
¼ cup red pepper, diced
1 can sliced mushrooms, drained
¼ lb. salami, diced (optional)

Mix rice with ingredients in part 3. Toss with vinaigrette in part 2. Pack tightly in an oiled ring mold or bundt pan. Refrigerate. Before serving, unmold rice ring on a bed of Boston leaf lettuce. Garnish with remaining hearts of palm and cherry or grape tomatoes. Serves 10-12.

BLUSHING SALAD

Salad:
4 heads Boston Bibb lettuce leaves separated, washed and dried well
1 cup canned or bottled sliced beets, drained
1 small red onion, sliced very thin

Dressing:
3 tbsp. vinegar
3 tbsp. kosher white wine
2 tbsp. vegetable oil
¾ tsp. Dijon mustard salt, to taste
¼ tsp. black pepper

croutons

Place the lettuce, beets and onions in a large salad bowl. Place all dressing ingredients in a jar. Shake to mix thoroughly. (May be prepared and refrigerated 2 days in advance). Just before serving, shake dressing and drizzle over the salad. Add croutons and toss the salad to coat evenly. Serve immediately. Serves 6-8.

HONEY ALMOND BISCOTTI

1½ cups unblanched almonds, toasted and divided in half
2 cups all purpose flour
½ cup sugar
½ tsp. baking powder
½ tsp. baking soda
½ tsp. cinnamon
½ cup honey
⅓ cup water

Preheat oven to 350. Grind half the almonds to a fine powder. Combine ground nuts, whole nuts, flour, sugar, baking powder, baking soda and cinnamon. Add honey and water; mix well until mixture forms dough.

Divide dough in half; shape each into a cylinder about 15 inches long. Place them well apart on a cookie sheet that has been lined with slightly oiled parchment paper or aluminum foil. Bake for 30 minutes or until firm and dark gold. Cool slightly.

Remove dough to cutting board. Slice into ½-inch slices and place cut side down on cookie sheet again; bake for 15 minutes or until lightly browned and dry. Makes about 4 dozen cookies.

Cookbook recalls Syrian Jewish traditions

BY PENNY SCHWARTZ
Special to The CJN

Ten years ago, Jennifer Abadi tied on an apron and armed herself with a notebook for weekly cooking lessons with her Grandma Fritzie, a Syrian-born Jew with a passion for food. Occasionally, they were joined by Abadi's mother and aunt.

The cooking sessions in Grandma Fritzie's small New York City kitchen were the prelude to Abadi's project – to learn and record the treasures of the unfamiliar world of Syrian Jewish cooking before it is lost.

Sitting in a Cambridge, Mass., coffee house recently, Abadi recalled the scene and said she had envisioned a cookbook to carry forth the traditions and roots of her grandmother's vanishing culture. Syrian Jewish recipes are rarely shared with the outside world, she explained.

Stories flowed with the food. And oh, what stories!

'Food embodies a culture'

You'll savour the results and discover the wealth of Jewish Syrian American life in A Fistful of Lentils, Syrian Jewish Recipes from Grandma Fritzie's Kitchen, written and illustrated by Jennifer Felicia Abadi, with a forward by Barbara Kafka (Harvard Common Press, $24.95).

Abadi, a 35-year-old graphic artist, spoke about her heritage and her worldwide vista.

"Food embodies a culture. It is the easiest way to learn about a place and its people."

Fistful readers embark on a culinary journey. Tucked into the more than 125 recipes are Abadi family tales, illustrations, photographs, history and detailed information about ingredients and preparation.

The recipes and stories are seasoned by the centuries with alluring spices – allspice and cumin; lots of salt; the smells and aromas of rose water, mint and lemon; and most especially, tamarind, adding the sweet and pungent zest of life which dominates this cuisine.

"The story begins 500 years ago," Abadi writes, "when Sephardi Jews fled from persecution in Spain and settled in Allepo, Syria, joining an ancient community of Oriental Jews, known as Mizrachi. In shared living quarters and in communal kitchens, the flavours of their cultures blended as the women spent their days preparing meals, expressing themselves boldly and creatively, and competing with a friendly spirit."

Grandma Fritzie, who was born in Allepo in 1915 or 1916, told Abadi of a vivid childhood memory: "I would stand at the doorway and watch the mothers cooking and chatting. The sights and aromas of the place have never left me."

Grandma Fritzie's family was among the large wave of Syrian Jews who immigrated to America in the 1920s and recreated their tightly woven, traditional community in the Ocean Parkway neighbourhood in Brooklyn, where even now, they maintain their strong cultural and religious customs.

Matloub Abadi, Grandma Fritzie's father, was the rabbi at the tiny Magen David Synagogue in Bensonhurst, Brooklyn, which, 75 years later, still exists.

"My family finds most Middle Eastern food too bland," Abadi said. "The ingredients in Syrian Jewish cooking are not complicated. There are just a few spices. But you should be able to taste the lemon juice, you should be able to taste the mint."

Abadi opens her hand to show a measurement – kemsheh, a handful, a fistful.

"When I asked my grandmother for her measuring cup, I was amazed to find out that she didn't have one," Abadi said. "Grandma Fritzie pulled out a big soup spoon and said that this was a tablespoon. "'Throw it in. Don't be shy,' my grandmother would say," Abadi repeated.

Abadi said the recipes in her book are better because she resisted the urge to cut back on the spices.

"For 60 years, my grandmother used the same warped, uneven aluminum pot to cook M'jedrah – rice with lentils," Abadi noted. So comforting is this Syrian soul food that Grandma Fritzie was asked to ship a potful via Federal Express to satisfy her grown, homesick grandson in Montana.

There's a wide selection of vegetarian recipes, as Syrian Jewish cooking follows the kosher Jewish dietary rules separating meat from dairy products.

Fowleh b'Bandoorah, string beans in tomato sauce, is rich and tangy with tamarind paste. The Yogurt-Mint Dressing (with cucumber) is a perfect light and smooth complement.

Dja'jeh Mish Mosh, sweet and tart chicken with apricots is an aromatic stew flavoured with tomato paste and and lemon.

But it is the platefuls of Sambusak – savoury pastries filled with either meat or cheese – another staple of Syrian cuisine – that are Abadi's hands-down favorite.

Desserts are sweet and prepared with such delicate ingredients as phyllo, pistachio nuts, rosewater and dried fruits.

A Fistful of Lentils is topped off with menus such as the humorous, Meet Your Suitor Afternoon Tea Party.

Abadi has created a book that – like Grandma Fritzie's M'jedrah pot – will stand up to the test of time. She closes her introduction with this invitation: "It'fadalu," welcome to our table, to which readers will reply, "Shuk'ren," thank you.

DJA'JEH MISH MOSH
SWEET-AND-TART CHICKEN WITH APRICOTS

Here is a delicious chicken recipe that will have your guests licking their fingers. The tangy apricots mixed with the tomato base create an aromatic stew. The use of apricots in savoury as well as sweet dishes is common in the Middle East. Serve with rice.

3 lb. chicken pieces (white and dark meat), skinned salt and freshly ground black pepper to taste
2 tbsp. vegetable oil

Sauce:
2 tbsp. vegetable oil
2/3 cup coarsely chopped yellow onions
2 tsp. minced garlic
1 6-oz. can unsalted tomato paste
1 1/4 cups cold water
3 tbsp. firmly packed dark brown sugar
6 tbsp. fresh lemon juice
salt and freshly ground black pepper to taste
1 1/4 cups dried whole Turkish apricots

Preheat oven to 350. Prepare the chicken. Rinse the chicken pieces under cold running water, pat dry with paper towels and sprinkle with salt and pepper. Place on a plate.

Heat the oil in a large skillet over medium-high heat. When the oil is very hot, add the chicken pieces and brown, cooking for 2 to 3 minutes on each side. Remove from the skillet and set aside.

Prepare the sauce. Heat the oil in the same skillet over medium heat and cook the onions, stirring, until golden and soft, 3 to 4 minutes. Add the garlic and cook, stirring, until golden, an additional 1 minute. (Be careful not to burn it.)

Combine the remaining sauce ingredients, except the apricots, in a medium-size bowl and pour into the skillet with the onion and garlic. Bring the sauce to a boil over high heat. Turn off the heat and set aside.

Arrange one layer of chicken in a small roasting pan (it is better if the chicken parts fit snugly so that the juices will not dry out). Cover the pieces with the apricots. Pour the sauce over the apricots, reserving 1/2 cup for later, and cover with aluminum foil for a tight-fitting lid. Bake for 1 hour.

After 1 hour, pour the remaining 1/2 cup sauce over the chicken and continue to bake, covered, until the chicken is tender, almost falling off the bones, about another 30 minutes. Serve hot, with the sauce spooned over rice. Serves 4.

KUSA B'JIBIN
SQUASH CHEESE PIE

3 tbsp. vegetable oil, plus more to coat the pan
1 cup finely chopped yellow onions
8 cups diced yellow squash and/or zucchini (about 4 large)
1/2 cup cold water
3 large eggs, lightly beaten
1 cup crumbled feta cheese or freshly grated Parmesan cheese
2 cups large-curd cottage cheese (preferably whole milk, but lowfat or nonfat can be substituted), pot cheese or farmer's cheese several grindings of black pepper dash of paprika

Preheat oven to 350. Heat the 3 tbsp. oil in a large skillet over medium heat and cook the onions, stirring, until golden and soft, 3 to 4 minutes.

Add the squash and water and simmer, covered, over medium-low heat until the squash is soft but not mushy, about 20 minutes, stirring occasionally.

In a large bowl, combine the beaten eggs, cheeses and black pepper. Mix well. Pour half of the cheese mixture into a separate large bowl.

Fold the cooked squash gently into the mixture in one of the bowls. Coat a 9-inch glass or other ovenproof baking dish with vegetable oil.

Pour in the squash-cheese mixture. Spread the remaining half of the cheese mixture on top and sprinkle with paprika for colour. (May be refrigerated at this point and baked later in the day, or frozen. It will keep for 4 to 5 days in the refrigerator, 3 to 4 weeks in the freezer. Defrost before baking.)

Place the pie in the centre of the oven and bake until the top is brown and the centre is firm when pierced with a knife, 50 to 60 minutes.

Let stand for 5 minutes before serving. Can be served hot or cold, with each serving topped with a dollop of Yogurt-Mint Dressing. Serves 6 to 8.

LEBAN M'NAA'NA
YOGURT-MINT DRESSING

The combination of cold yogurt and cucumber with dried mint is commonly eaten in the Middle East to cool down the body in the hot desert sun.

Kirbies are small cucumbers often used for pickling. They are good for eating raw as well. Because they don't have the thick, waxy skin found on the larger cucumbers in most supermarkets, they do not need to be peeled.

2 cups plain yogurt
1 heaping tbsp. dried mint leaves dash of garlic powder about 1/4 tsp. salt, to taste
1 cup peeled and finely chopped or coarsely grated Kirby cucumbers

Place the yogurt in a small bowl and stir until creamy. Add the dried mint by crushing between the palms of your hands. Add the garlic powder and salt and mix well.

Fold the cucumbers into the mixture, cover, and chill until serving time; it will keep, refrigerated, for up to 2 days. Makes 2 1/4 cups.

Dressing gives your salads variety and flair

BY EILEEN GOLTZ
Special to The CJN

No matter what the holiday meal, it is certain there will be salad served at some point. Even if you buy the pre-cut, pre-washed bags, home-made dressings make the salad special.

The following recipes are all pareve and they are so versatile that they are equally tasty with beef, chicken or fish. I prefer to dress my salads before I serve them, and most of these recipes will make a perfect amount to dress a salad that will serve eight people.

Of course you can make several different recipes and let your guests choose the one they like best.

HONEY BALSAMIC VINAIGRETTE

1/3 cup balsamic vinegar
2 tsp. honey
1 tsp. Dijon mustard
4 tsp. cold water
6-8 tsp. olive oil
1/4 tsp. each of salt and black pepper
1/4-1/2 tsp. herbs such as dill or basil (optional)

In a glass bowl, combine the vinegar and honey. Place the bowl in a microwave and warm the mixture for 20 seconds or more until honey dissolves in the vinegar. Add the mustard, water, olive oil, salt, pepper and herbs (if desired). Whisk to combine and then pour the dressing into a container with a lid. Cover and let set for at least 1/2 hour so that the ingredients can combine. Shake vigorously just before using. Makes approx. 1 cup. This recipe can be doubled or tripled.

ORANGE POPPY SEED DRESSING

2/3 cup oil
1/4 cup lime juice
2 tbsp. orange juice
2 tbsp. orange rind, grated
2 tbsp. honey
2 tbsp. onion; minced
1 tbsp. poppy seeds
salt and pepper to taste

Place all ingredients in a screw-top jar. Shake vigorously. Chill until ready to serve. For even more flavour, seeds should be slightly toasted in a 350-degree oven for about 5 minutes. Makes approx. 1 1/2 cups. This recipe can be doubled or tripled.

SOUTHWEST VINAIGRETTE

1/2 cup olive oil
1/4 cup white or rice wine vinegar
1 tbsp. lemon juice
1 tsp. mustard powder
1/2 tsp. oregano
1/4 tsp. black pepper
1/4 tsp. cilantro
1/4 tsp. garlic powder
1/4 tsp. cumin

Place all ingredients in a screw-top jar. Shake vigorously. Chill until ready to serve. Makes approx. 1 cup. This recipe can be doubled or tripled.

LIME AND CILANTRO VINAIGRETTE

1/2 cup olive oil
2 tbsp. mayonnaise
2 tbsp. lemon juice
2 tbsp. rice vinegar
1/4 cup fresh, shredded cilantro leaves, tightly packed
1/4 tsp. garlic powder
1/4 tsp. thyme
1/4 tsp. black pepper
1/8 tsp. cumin
a squeeze of fresh lime juice – about a quarter lime

Combine all the ingredients in a blender or food processor and process until fully mixed. Pour the mixture into a bowl and cover and chill until you're ready to serve.

ORIENTAL SALAD DRESSING

1/2 cup soy oil
2 tbsp. white vinegar
1 tbsp. tomato paste
1 tbsp. soy sauce
1/2 tsp. salt
1/2 tsp. ground ginger
1/2 cup sliced celery
1/4 cup onion, coarsely chopped

Combine oil, vinegar, tomato paste, soy sauce, salt, ginger, celery and onion in blender container and blend at medium speed 3 to 4 seconds until celery is finely grated. Pour the mixture into a bowl and cover and chill until you're ready to serve. Makes approx. 1 1/2 cups. This recipe can be doubled or tripled.

CREAMY ORANGE DRESSING

1/2 cup mayonnaise
1/4 cup freshly squeezed orange juice
2 tbsp. white sugar
1 tbsp. white wine vinegar cracked pepper

Combine all the ingredients in a bowl and whisk to combine. Pour the mixture into a bowl and cover and chill until you're ready to serve. Makes a scant cup. This recipe can be doubled or tripled.

THAI PEANUT DRESSING

1/2 cup chunky peanut butter
1/2 cup cider vinegar
1 cup oil
1/2 cup sugar
1/2 tsp. chopped fresh chili pepper or crushed red peppers
2 tbsp. chopped green onion

Combine all the ingredients in a bowl and whisk to combine. Makes 2 cups and is great as a dressing for a spinach salad or as a sauce with grilled poultry or meat on noodles.

Holiday Food Ideas

Brisket needs long, slow cooking

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

In our family, no meal is more anticipated than the annual holiday spread prepared by my mother on Rosh Hashanah. Every year at this time, she heads west along Highway 401, her car laden with bagels and other Montreal delicacies, to celebrate the new year in Toronto with her children, grandchildren and other extended family members.

For my children, the word bubbie is almost synonymous with chicken soup and matzah balls.

There's no doubt that my mother's chicken soup is the most revered dish of our holiday feast. However, there's no lack of appreciation for her brisket.

Over the years, the main course has varied between roasted turkey or roasted chicken, but there has always been brisket as far back as I can remember. In fact, brisket has been a traditional holiday staple for many Jewish families.

Brisket is a cut of beef from the front quarter of the cow. This roast is slow cooked for a long period of time to get maximum tenderness. My mother's brisket is so tender it melts in your mouth. It is so tasty, I couldn't imagine anyone being able to make brisket as well.

Marinating ahead of time gives the meat the flavour

However, about three years ago, I complimented her on her brisket, and was shocked to learn that my sister Sherri had made it. I was astounded. Her brisket was sweeter than my mother's, but no less tasty or tender. Ever since, Sherri makes it the first night of every holiday.

This year, we have so many holiday guests, I have offered to make the brisket for the second night of Rosh Hashanah.

I've been consulting with family, friends and professional cooks to find the best, and possibly the easiest, brisket recipe.

Almost everyone I asked has a recipe she swears by. My sister uses the recipe she got from her sister-in law Randi Winston. My friend Esther Kagan relies on Norene Gilletz's Marinated Brisket, while neighbour Evelyn Koch uses a recipe from Second Helpings Please, a cookbook often regarded as the bible of Canadian Jewish cuisine. A lot of these recipes call for everyday ingredients such as ketchup and dry onion soup mix to flavour the meat, and there are even recipes using cola drinks.

My neighbour, caterer and cookbook author, Lynn Mendelson, says brisket is the perfect dish for the most novice of cooks. Brisket is so forgiving you can probably do anything to it. Her secret for perfect brisket is to keep the roast submerged in liquid for optimum tenderness and make sure it is tightly covered in tin foil.

Mendelson uses her mother's Coke and onion soup recipe. She's not sure where her mother got it, but the dish is a sure-fire hit with her family. It's also simple to prepare, she adds.

"I love making it because it's no work. It's a one-pot meal. I add the carrots and potatoes into the pot. You can be adventuresome by adding parsnips and turnips. They'll add more flavour to the brisket."

She recommends making brisket a day ahead. She slices the meat across the grain into thin slices before reheating. "It always tastes better thinner. It absorbs more sauce that way."

There are two cuts of brisket – a lean one, called a single cut, and the double cut, which has a layer of fat in the middle. Essentially, the single cut eliminates the fatty layer and the meat on the bottom. Mendelson says the double cut is delicious, but most people cook the single.

"Anything cooked in fat tastes better because it's more flavourful. We don't have the palate for the fatty meat any more."

When asked about the fat content, cookbook author and brisket maven Norene Gilletz says, "Sometimes people have to choose between the pleasure principle or living to 120. I think the holiday is really a time not to worry too much about fat, and enjoy the yontif meal."

She recalls that in the past, brisket was served very regularly, but with people cutting back on beef consumption, it now tends to be served on special occasions.

Gilletz says she rarely cooks brisket the same way twice, and so over the years she has developed many recipes. However, she always sticks to a couple of key principles in her recipes. Marinated meat and long, slow cooking are the secrets to mouth-watering brisket.

The idea of marinating ahead of time gives the meat the flavour, she explains, noting that brisket is one of the easiest things in the world to make. Gilletz says it's time efficient and economical to make brisket a day ahead. You always get more if you cut it the next day.

She also recommends coating the roasting pan well with non-stick cooking spray to avoid heavy-duty scrubbing. Wrapping it in heavy-duty foil is another clean-up time-saver.

Since brisket comes in many shapes, Gilletz advises checking on the meat during the roasting process because a thinner cut of meat cooks faster.

Brisket freezes well and so she suggests making two roasts at a time. The meat can be cut and put in the freezer for another day.

It's great for company. It goes a long way with very little work, she says. It's easy, but looks fabulous. You can look like a great cook without putting in all the work.

That definitely sounds like my kind of cooking.

MRS. MENDELSON'S COKE BRISKET

1 4- to-5 lb. brisket
2 litres of any regular cola drink
2 packages of dry onion soup
¼ cup of ketchup
3 onions, sliced
2 carrots cut in 4-inch pieces
6-8 potatoes, sliced ½-inch thick
2 parsnips cut in 4-inch pieces (optional)
2 turnips, sliced ½-inch thick (optional)

A traditional holiday staple, brisket needs long, slow cooking

Put the onions at the bottom of a Dutch oven or covered roasting pan and lay the brisket on top of the onions. Sprinkle soup over top of brisket.

Slather ketchup over the brisket. Pour the Coke over the top of the brisket so that every thing gets mixed together. It can sit for an hour or two before cooking, but it's not necessary. Add remaining vegetables around the sides of the brisket. If there is a need to add more liquid during the cooking process, cola is preferable. You can also add red wine at the end.

Preheat oven to 350. Put roasting pan on the bottom shelf. The brisket needs to be well covered. It's easy to use tin foil. Make a tent using two large sheets of heavy-duty tin foil. Place one sheet going east-west and one north-south and fold edges up to make a tent. The tent makes it easier to open up and check the brisket without burning oneself. Allow 40-45 minutes of cooking time per pound.

MARINATED BRISKET

This recipe originally appeared in The Pleasures of Your Processor by Norene Gilletz. It can now be found in The Food Processor Bible also by Gilletz.

4- to 5-lb. brisket
3-4 onions
2 tsp. salt
fresh ground pepper to taste
1 tbsp. paprika
1 tsp. dry mustard
4 cloves of garlic
½ cup of soy sauce
2-3 tbsp. honey or maple syrup

Slice onions or use the food processor. Rub brisket on all sides with salt, pepper, mustard and paprika. Mince or process garlic. Add soy sauce and honey or syrup. Pour mixture over the meat and rub into the meat. Cover meat with tin foil and let marinate 1 hour or up to 24 hours in the refrigerator.

Preheat over to 325. Cook covered. Allow 45 minutes per pound, until the meat is fork tender. Uncover meat for the last hour and baste it occasionally. Let the roast stand 20-30 minutes before slicing. Slice brisket thinly across the grain Reheat slices in pan juices. Yields 8-10 servings.

Slow cooking gives brisket its maximum tenderness.

RANDI WINSTON'S BARBECUED BRISKET

5-7-pound beef brisket
3 cloves of garlic slivered
pepper and paprika to taste
1 cup of honey
1½-2 cups ketchup
1 envelop onion soup mix
1 tbsp. soy sauce

Preheat oven to 325. Make slits on top of the brisket. Insert garlic slivers. Place brisket in a large roasting pan.

Season meat with pepper and paprika. Combine honey, ketchup, onion soup mix and soy sauce in a saucepan. Cook over low heat until blended. Pour this sauce over the brisket. Cook covered until meat is tender. Uncover for last hour and baste occasionally. Let stand for about 20 minutes and then slice thinly.

Grandmothers show their stuff

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

Today's grandmother plays golf, travels the world, skis in Vaile, belongs to a gym and works outside the home. She is far from the image of the grandmother of a generation or two ago.

But under the bicycle helmet or bikini is a bubbie, gram, grandma or nanna who wants nothing more than to please her grandchildren, and what better way than to watch them eat one of her special meichels – a favourite recipe that she makes better than anyone else.

We asked three grandmothers, Esther Schwartz, Kitty Wintrob and Helen Cooper, to share some of their special recipes – dishes that their grandchildren look forward to at holiday time.

Schwartz is a professional cooking instructor. She loves trying new recipes and adapting recipes to make them kosher. Her joy is preparing what her grandchildren request, particularly when her Israeli grandchildren come for a visit.

The aroma of her grandmother's honey cake filled the house with goodness

"I've spent all my life creating recipes, but I get the most satisfaction in feeding my family," she says. "My grandchildren have been my best tasters and testers, and they have always inspired me."

Wintrob, who was born and raised in London, England, loves to entertain, and nothing pleases her more than to get a new recipe. She tries it, alters it, and makes it an inimitable Kitty Wintrob dish.

Her daughter, Suzanne told The CJN that when her mother asked her what gift she would like for her birthday several years ago, Suzanne replied, "All I want is your recipes."

Kitty put the recipes in a binder, each one between plastic sheets and presented them to her daughter. "I was thrilled with the gift," says Suzanne.

Holidays are a time for memories, and Helen Cooper who is a teacher and a proud grandmother, recalls her own grandmother, Anna Margolius, as she begins to review her recipes for the holidays, many of which were handed down through the generations.

Cooper says she was "lucky" to be raised in a house with a resident grandma, "one more pair of arms to be held in, one more lap to sit in, one more person to talk to and one more voice to be raised on my behalf."

But what she remembers most is her grandmother's special repertoire of holiday dishes. She says that when she began to have her own family, she wanted to recreate those tastes and smells, "that had been so formidable for me. But my grandmother always cooked varfed arein – nothing was ever measured. She cooked instinctually by feel."

Cooper sat beside her grandmother and watched her cook, and she attempted to measure the ingredients. "Slowly, and to my children's delight, I was able to recreate my grandmother's secret recipes."

Cooper recalls that the aroma of her grandmother's honey cake filled the house with goodness during the High Holy Days. "Its sweet smell reminds us to wish good things for each other during the coming new year."

Over the years, Cooper baked the honey cake for her children, students, their parents, and now for her grandchildren. "Like my grandma, this honey cake is totally accepting of whatever you do to it. You may mismeasure, undercook or overcook it, and it still manages to taste delicious."

SWEET & SOUR FRICASSEE

From Esther Schwartz

Part 1
2 tbsp. oil
½ diced onion
½ diced celery
salt, pepper, paprika
mixed giblets of choice: cut up necks, gizzards, wings, broiled livers, feet and hearts of two chickens

In a deep pot heat oil; saute onions and celery until limp. Add giblets, sprinkle with salt, pepper and paprika. Let brown, stirring occasionally.

Part 2 – Sauce
1 tbsp. vinegar
¼ cup fresh lemon juice
⅓ cup brown sugar
1 bottle chili sauce
½ cup water
1 tin tomato and mushroom sauce
1 tsp. salt
few gratings of fresh pepper
1 bay leaf (optional)

Mix ingredients together and pour over giblet mixture.

Part 3
1 lb. chopped meat
few sprinklings of fresh pepper
¼ cup beef or chicken stock
1 garlic clove, crushed

Mix ingredients together. Form into small balls and place in pot with the giblets and sauce. Cover and simmer for two to three hours. Serves 8.

Note: This fricassee is better the day after. Any leftover sauce is delicious with chicken, tongue, veal or over spare ribs.

CRUSTY POTATO CHOLENT

From Esther Schwartz

1 tbsp. oil
5 lb. potatoes (P.E.I. or Yukon Gold)
1 large onion, grated
2 tsp. salt
1 tsp. pepper
¼ cup challah or bread crumbs
1 lb. flanken (slit at each bone)

Heat oil in a heavy pot. Make sure sides of pot are coated. Grate potatoes into cold water. Drain well or spin dry in lettuce spinner. Mix potatoes with grated onion, salt, pepper and challah crumbs.

Pour half the potato mixture into pot. Place flanken pieces in the middle and top with remaining potato mixture. Cover. Heat on top of stove at medium high heat. When it begins to steam, turn to a very low heat and simmer for 6-7 hours, mixing with wooden spoon every two hours. The bottom gets crusty and everyone including the children will clamour for it. Cook this the day before as it is better the second day. If it is too solid the second day, reheat in oven or on top of stove, adding a little gravy or stock. Delicious. Freezes well. Serves 8-10.

Challah crumbs:
To make challah crumbs, dry leftover challah in a 350-degree oven for 10 minutes. Grate or process in blender or food processor. Store in a glass jar in refrigerator or freeze in plastic bags.

STUFFED HONEYED BAKED APPLES

From Kitty Wintrob

Take 6 large spy apples cored and thinly peeled at top. Prick apples here and there to prevent bursting. Soak some raisins and chopped apricots in a little sweet wine. Add a handful of chopped nuts. Stuff core with this mixture.

Sprinkle apples with cinnamon and cover with honey. Place in a baking dish with about one inch of hot water. Bake at 375 for about 30 minutes until apples are tender but have not burst, basting with liquid from pan from time to time. Serve warm or cold with a dollop of ice cream, sour cream or yogurt.

KITTY'S PUMPKIN OR APPLE LOAF

4 eggs
1½ cups sugar
1¼ cups oil
1 can pumpkin or apple pie filling
3 cups flour
2 tsp. baking powder
1½ tsp. baking soda
3 tsp. cinnamon
½ cup chopped nuts
1 cup raisins
1 tsp. vanilla

Mix in large bowl in order given, beating eggs and sugar well. Sift dry ingredients. Add nuts and raisins last. Pour into two loaf pans lined with parchment and sprayed with oil. Bake at 350 for 1 hour until toothpick comes out dry when inserted at centre. Cool before removing from pan. When ready to serve sprinkle with icing sugar. Freezes well.

GRANDMA ANNA MARGOLIUS HONEY CAKE

8-oz. glass of strong tea
1 tsp. baking soda
4 large eggs
2 cups of white sugar
1 cup vegetable oil
1 cup liquid honey
2 tsp. baking powder
2½ cups of white flour

Preheat oven to 325. Make an 8-oz glass of strong tea. Add baking soda and let the mixture stand. Beat eggs in a bowl until they turn lemon yellow. Add sugar slowly, beating until the mixture is lemon yellow.

Add vegetable oil and beat well. Add liquid honey and beat well. Mix baking powder into flour. Add the flour/baking powder mixture and the tea/baking soda alternately to the batter. Beat well.

Pour the batter into a 13 x 8 oiled Pyrex dish. Bake one hour or until done.

Note: Can be baked in large muffin tins for about 12 to 15 minutes to create treats for school lunch boxes.

Use a crock pot to cook it slowly but surely

By EILEEN GOLTZ
Special to The CJN

Once relegated to making chicken soup or cholent, today's crock pot has become the kitchen gadget to have on your counter top.

Slow cooking usually works at low heat with the lid on, and there is hardly any liquid lost during the cooking process. Sometimes it seems like you have more liquid than when you started because almost all food, especially meats and vegetables, contain water, and as they cook they begin to release their water.

With most cooking methods, the water turns to steam and evaporates. But since the lid is on the slow cooker, there's nowhere for the steam to go; it just collects on the lid and drips back into the food.

The slow cooker is one of the few cooking methods in which you can cut the cooking time in half by turning up the temperature, and still get great results.

Food will not burn because it retains the moisture, and because the heat is evenly and gently distributed around the sides as well as the bottom of the pot. If something takes 10 hours on the low setting, you can safely cook it for five hours on the high setting with similar results.

Helpful crock pot/slow cooker hints:

• If you're not using a cooking bag, spray the inside of the crock pot/slow cooker with cooking spray. It makes cleanup easier.
• Carrots, turnips and potatoes take longer to cook, so cut them into small pieces or thinly slice them and make sure you place them in the bottom of the crock pot/slow cooker.
• Always cook and drain ground meats before adding them to the slow cooker.
• Thaw frozen vegetables before placing them in the slow cooker. Adding frozen vegetables will lower the internal temperature, and the dish will take longer to cook.
• Be sure to allow sufficient cooking time. Most soups, stews and one-dish meals require about 8 to 10 hours on the slow cooker's low heat setting.
• Coat the meat you want to use with flour. It will help to thicken the liquid as it cooks.
• If you're inventing your own slow cooker recipes or adapting your favourite stovetop and oven recipes for the slow cooker, decrease the amount of liquid you use.
• Note: All of the following recipes can be made in the oven.

CROCK POT BARBECUE BEEF

A zesty, easy to make dish that's perfect for Sukkot. Spoon meat onto challah rolls and top with additional barbecue sauce.

1½ cups ketchup
¼ cup packed brown sugar
¼ cup red wine vinegar
2 tbsp. prepared Dijon-style mustard
2 tbsp. soy sauce
1 tsp. liquid smoke flavouring
½ tsp.salt
¼ tsp. ground black pepper
¼ tsp. garlic powder
4-lb. brisket

In a large bowl, combine the ketchup, brown sugar, red wine vinegar, Dijon-style mustard, soy sauce and liquid smoke. Stir in salt, pepper and garlic powder. Place the roast in the slow cooker. Pour the ketchup mixture over the roast. Cover, and cook on Low for 8 to 10 hours.

Remove the roast from slow cooker, shred with a fork, and return to the crock pot/slow cooker. Stir meat to evenly coat with sauce. Serves 8 to 10

APPLE AND BROWN SUGAR CORNED BEEF

1 corned beef brisket
4 cups apple juice
1 cup brown sugar
1 tbsp. prepared mustard
8 small red potatoes
2 medium carrots, pared and cut into chunks
1 onion, peeled and cut into eighths
½ head cabbage, cut into chunks

Place all ingredients in a large crock pot/slow cooker (cut meat in half if necessary) and stir to mix. Cook on high for 4 to 5 hours or on low for 8 to 10 hours. Remove meat and vegetables and some of the cooking liquid. Slice meat thinly across the grain and serve with the vegetables and some of the liquid. Makes 6 servings.

ORANGE GLAZED CHICKEN

6 oz. orange juice, frozen concentrate, thawed
6 chicken breast halves
½ tsp.marjoram
1 dash ground nutmeg
1 dash garlic powder
¼ cup water
2 tbsp.cornstarch

Combine the thawed orange juice concentrate in a bowl with the marjoram, garlic powder and nutmeg. Dip each chicken breast half into the orange juice to coat completely. Place the coated chicken in the crock pot/slow cooker.

Pour the remaining orange juice mixture over the chicken. Cover and cook on low for 6-8 hours or on high for about 4 hours. When chicken is done, remove it to a serving platter. Pour the sauce that remains in slow cooker/crock pot into a saucepan. Mix the cornstarch and water and stir into the juice in pan.

Cook over medium heat, stirring constantly, until thick and bubbly. Serve the sauce over the chicken; delicious with brown or white rice. Serves 6.

SLOW COOKER CRANBERRY TURKEY BREAST

1 thawed turkey breast (you can use frozen)
1 envelope onion soup mix
1 can cranberry sauce

Place the turkey in the crock pot/slow cooker. In a bowl combine the cranberry sauce and soup mix and pour the mixture over the turkey breast.

Cook on high for 2 hrs. then on low for 7 hrs. If you use frozen, cook on high for 2 hrs. then on low for 10 hrs. or more.

MUSHROOM AND BEEF STEW

Tender chunks of beef simmered with wine, garlic and thyme, and accented with mushrooms, is perfect for any meal.

2 lb. beef for stew, cut into 1-inch pieces
¼ cup all-purpose flour
1 tsp. salt
½ tsp. pepper
½ tsp. dried thyme leaves, crushed
¼ cup ready-to-serve beef broth
¼ cup tomato paste
¼ cup dry red wine
2 cloves garlic, minced
1 lb.red-skinned potatoes (1½-inched diameter), cut into quarters
8 oz. mushrooms cut into quarters
1 cup baby carrots
fresh parsley (optional)

Combine the flour, salt, pepper and thyme in small bowl. Place the beef in the crock pot/slow cooker. Sprinkle the meat with the flour mixture and toss to coat.

In a bowl combine the broth, tomato paste, wine and garlic in small bowl; mix well. Pour the mixture over the beef. Add the potatoes, mushrooms and carrots and mix well. Cover and cook on high 5 to 6 hours or on low 8 to 9 hours, or until beef and vegetables are tender. (No stirring is necessary during cooking but stir well before serving). Garnish with parsley, if desired. Makes 6 servings.

Family dinners a time to connect

By RAHEL MUSLEAH
Special to The CJN

Family dinners evoke a swell of emotions for Blu Greenberg. Sometimes a memory will make her laugh uncontrollably, like the time her daughter Deborah cut school and Greenberg tried to elicit a confession at dinner. Her son David tried to warn his sister by slipping her a note in French: "Confessez-vous. Elle savait." (Confess. She knows). Greenberg carries that note in her wallet to this day, 20 years later.

"It's an unending source of amazement how much conversation you can have night after night at dinner," says Greenberg, author and president of the Jewish Orthodox Feminist Alliance in the United States.

"It's always a little interesting, a little silly, a little serious. It's always loving, there's always a little politicking, a little anger, a little pain and a little glory."

Greenberg's notions of family dinners have been imprinted in her consciousness from a young age.

Like many who make family dinners a priority, the family she grew up in always ate dinner together at 6 p.m.

"That's what made our family a family," she says. "I never realized this wasn't what the rest of world was doing. When I had children, and they were old enough to sit at table, I used to wait until my husband came home. Sometimes it was late. I thought that was a major contribution I made toward creating our sense of family."

For Greenberg and countless North American families, mealtimes are the cornerstone of family life. They are a time of connection, centring, catching up, scheduling, perspective, praise and problem-solving, often the only time the whole family is together during the day.

For others, eating together has taken a backseat to children's after-school activities, their parents' long, tiring hours at work, the fragmentation and individualization of family life. Laments over the demise of the family dinner range from sociological studies to poetic elegies.

"Family is the most powerful transmitter of identity," explains Dr. Rela Mintz Geffen, author, sociologist and president of Baltimore Hebrew University. "The absence of family meals leads to the feeling that there's an absence of family."

According to the NPD Group, which studies eating patterns in the United States, about half of American families eat dinner together every night, a modest increase over the mid-1990s.

Of 2,000 families surveyed in 2000, 49 per cent ate together seven days a week, compared to 45 per cent in 1995; 74 per cent ate together five out of seven days, compared to 72 per cent in 1995.

Eighty per cent of all dinners are eaten at home, and 76 per cent of meals are still prepared by women. NPD does not have data tracing eating patterns back 30 years, but, says NPD vice-president Harry Balzer, the numbers were probably not that much different then, despite public perception.

"Family meals require social conformity," says William Doherty, professor of family social science at the University of Minnesota and author of the forthcoming book, Putting Family First (Holt). "You have to gather at the same time; eat more or less the same food; make conversation together rather than read, play video games or watch television; and finish at the same time. Sounds oppressive, doesn't it?"

For some, maybe. For others, it is stuff of fond memories. "My brothers and I each had chores to do for setting the table," recalls Charles Neuman, a 32-year-old computer programmer and father of one-year-old Avishai.

"Mine was the napkins. And we rotated who got to sit 'alone' each night. There were three of us kids, two on one side and one on the other. The two who sat together inevitably had some issues of the other crossing the 'property line.'

"At the dinner table, we basically counselled my mother through her first few years of teaching. We absorbed stories about troubled students and disorganized administration. Oh, there's also having to be excused. *M*A*S*H started at 7:30 and at 7:29 we were squirming to leave the table."

Trivial though they may be, it is often these tiny, commonplace details that contain the most lasting memories.

Family meals present the central daily opportunity for ritual, which Doherty defines as any co-ordinated, repeated activity with emotional meaning.

Rituals can surround foods, chores, conversation: their mundane nature often masks deeper values – self sufficiency, responsibility, respect for property, teamwork, and caring for one another, according to Dr. Jody Elizabeth Myers, professor of religious studies and co-ordinator of the Jewish studies program at California State University, Northridge.

The connection between food and the Jewish spirit is as ancient as the Torah, which is filled with ancestral stories of worship and thanks through offerings of food. The laws of kashrut elevate food to a spiritual level, as do the blessings recited before and after eating almost anything. The book of Leviticus contains "recipes" for the menus of the day prepared and offered by the priests, Myers notes.

After the Temple was destroyed, the rabbis transformed these sacrificial rites into domestic table rituals. The Sabbath offerings, for example, were re-enacted in three special meals. The Passover sacrifice became a family feast with highly symbolic foods.

Family is the most powerful transmitter of identity

"Popular tradition teaches that Jews have been 'the people of the book,' prizing Torah study above all," Myers says. "This is only partly true. Rabbinic Judaism made us 'the people of the table' as well. The table was at the centre of every Jewish dwelling. Laden with food, it substituted for the altar."

While numerous surveys have documented the varied facets of North American Jewish life, almost no statistics point to how much and when Jewish families eat together, says Geffen.

Sharing food is entwined with religion in every tradition, but Judaism centres its food-based rituals at home rather than in a public venue like a temple or church. Communal dinners are at the core of Jewish life, reinforced by the Jewish calendar and the laws of keeping kosher. Shabbat's scripted blessings and foods – challah, wine and more – drape the family meal in a mantle of tradition. "The structure makes it more compelling and helps the contemporary family to say, 'This is sacred time,'" says Geffen.

Amy Lederman, a former lawyer who is now Jewish educator in Tucson, Ariz., advises families to elevate every dinner – not just Shabbat and holiday meals.

"Our family made a commitment to keeping kosher 10 years ago to try to bring in the daily consciousness of God and our Jewish heritage," she notes.

The Ledermans often use dinner to discuss and vote on potential changes, like whether the family should become kosher or take a sabbatical year in Israel. But their usual ritual begins with the basics: everyone gets a turn to ask and be asked, "How was your day?"

"It trains the kids to get out of themselves, to care about others, and to talk about things other than what's going on in their world," Lederman says.

Despite the rewards, most families acknowledge that pulling dinner together is not always easy. Organization is crucial, Lederman says. "Plan the night before or in the morning so it's not overwhelming when you get home from

Sephardi recipes are a welcome addition to any cook's menu

By RUTH HEIGES
IPS

Thanks to the growth in popularity of the Mediterranean menu, Sephardi cuisine is finally being discovered. The following recipes will be sure to complement your holiday menu.

SEPHARDI LEEK SOUP (SOPA DE PRASA)

Meat or pareve

¼ cup olive or vegetable oil
10 medium leeks, trimmed, sliced and well washed (or 5 leeks and 2 large yellow onions)
2 large baking potatoes or 3 medium carrots, peeled and grated
1 bunch parsley, chopped
8 cups chicken or vegetable broth or water about 1½ tsp. salt, or to taste
¼ tsp. ground black pepper
pinch of grated nutmeg (optional)

Heat the oil in a 6-quart pot over a medium heat. Add the leeks and the potatoes or carrots. Sauté until softened (about 5-10 minutes).

Add the parsley, broth, salt, pepper and [optional] nutmeg.

Bring to a boil. Cover, reduce the heat to low, and simmer about 40 minutes, until tender. Adjust seasonings. Serve the soup as is or process in a blender. May be served warm or chilled. Yield: 8 servings.

EGYPTIAN BLACK-EYED PEAS WITH CILANTRO (LUBIA)

Pareve

Adapted from The World of Jewish Entertaining by Gil Marks (Simon & Schuster, 1998)

2 large garlic cloves, chopped
3 tbsp. olive oil
2 10-oz. packages (4 cups) frozen black-eyed peas or 1½ cups dried black-eyed peas (picked over, drained and rinsed)
1 8-oz. can tomato sauce
2 tsp. chopped fresh cilantro root (if unavailable, then chopped cilantro stems)
3 tbsp. chopped fresh cilantro leaves, plus additional whole leaves for garnish salt and ground black pepper to taste steamed, long-grain white rice (per number of diners)

Cook the garlic in the olive oil over a gentle heat in a large saucepan until soft and beginning to turn golden, about 2 to 3 minutes. Add the peas, tomato sauce, cilantro root or stems. Add enough fresh cold water to cover the peas by about 1 inch. Bring to a boil. Cover the pot and simmer over a low heat. If using frozen peas, add the salt and pepper after 10 minutes. If using dried peas, add the seasonings after 20 minutes.

Add more water, if necessary, to keep the peas quite soupy. There should be enough water to form a sauce. Cook frozen peas for a total of 20 to 30 minutes; dried peas for 35 to 45 minutes, or until tender.

Stir in the chopped cilantro and serve the lubia over steamed white rice or a pilaf. Garnish with the whole cilantro leaves. Yield: 6 to 8 servings.

COUSCOUS WITH SEVEN VEGETABLES

Pareve

Adapted from The Gefilte Variations by Jayne Cohen (Scribner, 2000)

6 cups vegetable stock or water
6 carrots (2½ cups), cut into chunks
3 onions, quartered
2 turnips (3 cups), peeled and quartered
2 stalks celery, sliced
2 sticks of cinnamon (3 inches, each) or 1 tsp. ground cinnamon
½ to 1 tsp. ground cumin
½ tsp. ground turmeric
1 tsp. salt
black pepper, to taste
1 butternut squash or small pumpkin, peeled, seeded and cut into 2-inch pieces
½ head green cabbage, shredded (5 cups)
2 cups cooked or canned chickpeas or fava beans
1 tbsp. chopped coriander or parsley
couscous, cooked per package directions

Bring 6 cups stock or water to a boil. Add the carrots, onions, turnips, celery, cinnamon, cumin, turmeric, salt and pepper. Cover, reduce heat to low, and simmer for 30 minutes.

Add the squash, cabbage, chickpeas (or fava beans) and coriander (or parsley). Cook until tender (about 20 minutes).

To produce a thicker sauce, use a potato masher or the back of a wooden spoon to mash some of the chickpeas or squash against the bottom of the pot. Spoon cooked couscous onto a large deep-sided platter or individual serving plates. Make a well in the centre and fill it with vegetables. Pour 1 to 2 cups of stock over the couscous. Pass around the remaining stock. Serve warm. Yield: 6 servings

The importance of dinner is not lost on children

work. Cook meals on Sundays. Enlist the help of your spouse and kids. You have to be committed to the idea, but also flexible. We've had movie nights and pretend picnics on the floor."

The importance of dinner is not lost on children.

For her 45th birthday three years ago, Lederman's son Joshua, then 13, cooked an entire dinner as a gift to his mother. He set the table with candles and wine, made homemade french bread; a gourmet salad with mandarin oranges and avocado; pasta, and pie with ice cream for dessert. His mother was the guest of honour.

But not all families feel they have the resources or support to make dinner a priority.

'Everything we first know in the world comes from family. How can we learn from people who aren't there?'

After Jane Cutler divorced, she had to fit the reality of single parenthood into her definition of family. "We no longer had traditional family dinner. We didn't have, in the traditional sense, a family. And my heart was broken," says the author of Family Dinner, a children's book she wrote as a path to healing. (Farrar Straus Giroux, 1991).

In the book, when Great Uncle Benson comes to visit, he's mystified that 10-year-old Rachel's family – a two-parent, three-kid family – doesn't have family dinners. Her father watches the news; her mother goes jogging, and the children all like to eat something different.

Though Uncle Benson tries to revive family dinners, whipping up exotic delights like Hundred Garlic Soup and Kansas City Macaroni and Cheese Casserole, family dinner doesn't work at Rachel's house. It turns out her parents both had negative memories – arguing, being forced to eat, or speaking only when spoken to – at their family dinners.

"Family" dinner does eventually succeed, but with a configuration of friends and neighbours instead of the immediate family.

"The book expressed my feeling that a new kind of family could embody the virtues of family even if it couldn't rely upon the old forms," Cutler explains.

Patricia Volk's food-inspired memoir, Stuffed: Adventures of a Restaurant Family (Knopf), describes Thursday night gatherings at her grandmother's house for dramatic, seven-course dinners that spanned four generations and could accommodate 25. Now, says Volk, whose family owned Morgen's, a chain of 14 restaurants in Manhattan, most big dinners take place on Jewish holidays.

"There's nothing quite as wonderful as looking around the table and seeing faces you love and serving them good food. I always set the table with things that have been handed down to me, so I feel the presence of the people who used to be at my grandmother's table."

It's impossible to separate food and family, Volk says.

"I wrote Stuffed partly out of the fear that family is vanishing. Once we were five generations living in a four-block radius. Now those people are in Honolulu, Arizona and Boca Raton. If I wanted my family around me at dinner, the table would have to be 4,968 miles long."

She sums up the reason for having dinner as a family: "Everything we first know in the world comes from family. How can we learn from people who aren't there?"

SpaMedica (66 Avenue Rd., Toronto) now has an acne program that includes a new and fabulous Clear Light Device. This unique process emits a UV-safe, intense blue light that strikes the acne-dense regions of the skin and kills the bacteria that cause acne.

The actual cause of acne is bacteria that proliferate at the base of the sebaceous glands of the skin. This method is one of the first that helps to eradicate the acne where it begins. The treatment plans are individual and take from four to 16 weeks. The goal is to eliminate active outbreaks, control future flare-ups as safely and effectively as possible and eliminate the use of harmful drugs.

Hugo Boss adds 16 spectacular new styles to its woman's sunglass collection. The styles are exquisitely alluring and make the perfect accessory for any outfit. The lens provides full ultra-violet protection, regardless of the tint density. Many of the frame styles pay homage to the eyewear of past decades and to the tinsel charm of Cannes. They are a surprising blend of current technology and the glam of the past – available at Karir, at both the Yorkdale and Yorkville Toronto locations.

Making a makeup decision this fall will not be easy. The palettes are full of the most fun shades of glimmering multi-coloured bubbles and bobbles. Why choose one colour when you can wear a few at a time? Pull your face together with the ultimate of shimmer for your eyes, lips and nails.

Be sure to have fabulous brushes on hand for easy application – NARS introduces four new ones this season. Smoulder your eyes with murky coal and polish your lips with bursts of berries – confidence gives you the edge.

Carita Paris 'Creme de nuit' skin care.

CAROL'S TIPS

SKIN CARE: It's a deliciously indulgent "tea time" for your body and Elizabeth Arden provides the goods. Fizzing tub tablets and crushed sugar scrubs are on the menu, so choose an evening and create your own spa.

Shiseido introduces New Pureness, a complete line of products developed specifically for young women. This interesting collection is designed to control excess sebum while maintaining a high moisture level in the outer layer of skin.

At the other end of the spectrum, Shiseido formulates Future Solution. Its unique blend of ingredients strengthens the skin barrier while minimizing the appearance of fine lines.

Jennifer Lopez creates her own fragrance called Glow.

Carita Paris treats us this season with two truly wonderful creams. La Crème Parfait – which targets reduction of feminine hormones – it is designed for woman approaching or in menopause and Crème de Nuit has a relaxing ingredient to help you sleep more peacefully.

Michael Kors' Leg Shine can be applied to arms, shoulders and back; its solid stick packaging is perfect to glisten your body and particularly great for no-nylon legs.

Zirh is a high-end men's skin-care line that has won Design Awards in both '97 and '98. It prides itself on its three-part system: clean, correct and protect. Its alpha-hydroxy wash is exceptional, and this season, Zirh presents a fresh and inviting fragrance.

For women age 50 and over, Lancome's Absolue Eye Treatment is consummate for the fragile eye area and acts on all problems associated with aging. Its trio of ingredients – wild yam, soy and brown algae – combine to nourish, restructure and restore elasticity.

FOUNDATION: Estee Lauder's So Ingenious Multi-Dimension Makeup and Loose Powder will make a foundation wearer out of the most makeup shy. It feels like your own skin and it lasts all day!

Touche Liberte from Lancôme is a new "supernatural" shade that actually suits all skin tones. Its shimmering effect is superb.

For magical nights, highlight cheekbones, eyelids and cleavage with Lancaster's Evanescent Powder – it provides a metallic blue and iridescent lilac sheen that just plays with light.

An excellent face finisher from the Elizabeth Taylor Color Cosmetic line is a new translucent powder compact trimmed splendidly with a circular pave glitter – what a showpiece!

BEAUTY SHOP

BY CAROL WISE

CHEEKS: Irreelle Blush is a new blusher from Chanel. It contains photo-reflective pigments that soften the appearance of fine lines – available in five shades. From chocolate to glowing pink, the iridescent multi-effects are quite stunning.

Another treasure from Chanel is Les Perles de Chanel. This autumn-winter star product is a limited edition and should not be missed. Thirteen perfectly shaped pearls dance in harmony, joining four natural shades to illuminate lips, eyelids and cheeks. Included is a long, fine foam applicator for perfect execution.

Try NARS Multiple Stick rouge in the colour sheer wine – just gorgeous and what a great traveller!

Another really special cream rouge in a compact form is from Revlon's Age Defying Collection – very smooth and silky. Cream blush is good for all skin types, but particularly great for dry skin.

LIPS: Lips come into the spotlight with Lancome's Gloss Focus. It can be layered or worn on its own.

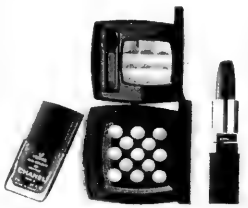
Check out Cargo's Reverse Lip Liner. It's a natural colour and when applied to the outer mouth, it gives a fuller appearance.

Fuller appearance: Cargo's Reverse Lip Liner

Lise Watier's Crayolip Duo combines liner and lipstick for multi-task girls – offering a variety of shades including Blind Date and Sweet Kiss.

Elizabeth Arden's Dual Perfection lipstick-lipliner combines demi-matte lipstick and matching smooth lipliner that lasts all day.

For the moistest lips in town, try Clinique's Moisture Surge Lipstick SPF 15. Its treatment qualities are equalled only by the yummy berry shades.



Les Perles de Chanel.

NAILS: This season, become a little daring with Yves Saint Laurent – with nails dipped in black-tinged purple or incandescent garnet red.

Estee Lauder's Pure line presents an interesting amethyst and garnet.

Shiseido The Makeup introduces two new shades, iced onyx and mod pink that contain an ultra-fine glitter and condition nails as they resist peeling and fading.

EYES: Yves Saint Laurent's Eyeliner Emerald Reflections adds a dash of green to enhance your eye – a very neat twist.

Rimmel London's double-ended two-tone pencil is easy to apply and the colours are stellar. Camouflage for the eye area is the most important single step to alluring eyes.

This season, Chanel provides us with the most comprehensive compact, including four corrective shades to be used alone or in combination – its name – Pro Correcteur.

Pro Long Lash mascara from MAC is terrific – lots of lushness and length-in seven flowery shades.

Limited edition from Revlon is a terrific 10-shade eye shadow palette – impressive and very practical.

Moon River eyeliner from NARS is a beautiful, deep navy blue that will brighten the whites of your eyes.

Color Focus eye colour from Lancôme has pearly reflections and a powdery yet silky texture.

Lancaster's new Khol eye pencil goes on like velvet and presents in three shades, black, black-green and black-blue. Do your smouldering with their glittering black shadows – sensational! Both are from Lancaster's Intriguing Night collection.

A must have from Estee Lauder's Mineralites collection is Illusionist Maximum Curling Mascara in teal – day or night, it's fabulous.

Agent Double from Lise Watier, a double-coloured pencil, is a snap to apply. It is creamy upon application and magically transforms into a lightly powdered finish.

Translucent Eyebrow Shaper from Shiseido The Makeup is fascinating. It's a liquid shaper that contours and defines while adding lustre and strength. Also from Shiseido The Makeup is Distinguish Mascara, a unique waterproof formula that separates and adds fullness at the same time.

HAIR: Robyn Alex at the Terry Ritcey Salon at 122A Yorkville Ave. (416-926-0123) not only can cut and colour your hair in superb order, but recently she plucked my best friend's eyebrows, and her whole face looks better! Alex is definitely the undisputed queen of eyebrow shaping.

Ritcey tells us that the best way to describe hair this fall is "free and easy." Long-flowing waves and short-cropped tops are a taste of what's happening.

Whatever the length, a decided lack of restraint compliments the free-spirited look of the hippie-inspired fashions. Even up-do's are free form.

FRAGRANCE: The Healing Garden has a comfy little baby set with baby lotion, baby bath and the sweetest stuffed animal sheep.

Marc Jacobs' Body Crème is whipped to pure white perfection and is as fragrant as fresh gardenias. Marc Jacobs also presents a very distinctive, uncomplicated collection especially for men. Its essence is much like a fig with a green woodsy scent.

Oscar de la Renta's Intrusion body cream is filled with sensuality and will no doubt arrest the masculine world – it's almost bewitching. For best results, layer with their body line.

Esprit's new Fragrance Collection offers five unique scents. Just to mention a few: for my dreams, for my spirit and for my fantasy. Lots of fun and they smell great!

Beauty products from Estee Lauder.

Smooth some of Lauder's Intuition Fragrance Silk over your pulse points; its gel-like texture is quite sensual.

Romeo Gigli for men in the classic fragrance is true to its name – classic. And do not miss Byblos; the scent is very sexy – perfect for your special guy.

Moisturize your whole body with Versus's Time to Relax massage mousse. The packaging is stunning; it's the perfect gift.

L'Eau Cheap & Chic from Moschino couldn't be more adorable. It's packaged in a mound of jelly beans and the scent is sensational.

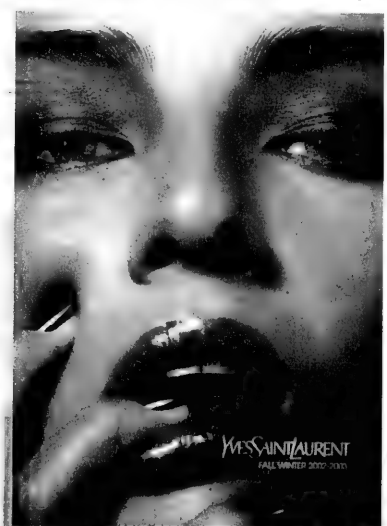
Rimmel London's fragrance collection is brand new, young and fresh with teenagers in mind.

Women are buzzing about Estee Lauder's Pleasures Intense, a fuller, deeper counterpart to the original. It's a modern interpretation of a lush floral garden.

Shiseido creates a new fragrance called Zen. This pure scent could be called the quintessence of an elegant Japanese spirit. It has a sense of serenity similar to meditation.

Brand new from Elizabeth Taylor is Forever Elizabeth, a perfect name that so resembles its creator. Like the lady herself, the scent is a true inspiration.

Jennifer Lopez creates her own fragrance called Glow. It's fresh, sexy and clean, a scent you intuit when you're close, a scent of bare, glowing skin warmed by body heat – almost as creamy as a bunch of white roses.



Become a little daring with Yves Saint Laurent.

Clothier celebrates 50th year

By MIRIAM CHINSKY
Special to The CJN

Saul Korman, owner of Korry's Clothiers to Gentlemen, affirmed his faith in the Danforth long ago despite the advice of well-meaning friends who urged him to relocate to Yonge Street.

Now, with his handsome bi-level premises in the heart of bustling, colourful Greektown at 569 Danforth Ave. just west of Pape Avenue, Korman has launched an ongoing celebration of 50 years in business, culminating with an in-store party on Oct. 17.

At the party, there will be a draw for a one week trip for two, including accommodations, at the Maho Beach Hotel in St. Marten on the Caribbean.

Born in Noranda, Que., Korman later moved to Toronto, where he went into retail menswear with his father Nathan at Danforth and Coxwell avenues.

Korman bought the present building in 1969 and took over as owner and president when Nathan retired in 1975.

Today, Korman has earned an enviable reputation in business. He likes people and action; he is involved in the community. His store attracts customers from across Toronto and the city's outlying areas and into the United States.

Energetic, innovative, combining a youthful outlook with a veteran's know-how, Korman seems to be everywhere, buying, selling, lecturing, advertising on radio and in print.

An entrepreneur, he has introduced a number of Korry's specialized services geared to his customers' specific needs. The store offers assessments of personal clothing requirements in keeping with business and social obligations, lifestyle and budgetary considerations. Private wardrobe consultation with trained staff is provided by appointment.

Saul Korman

Both made-to-measure and ready-made suits and coats are available. Clothing needs for busy executives can be accommodated in the seclusion of their own office.

Korman "kvells" when he talks about buying from the finest houses, including Arnold Brant, Hugo Boss, Canali, and he mentions his private label, Roberto, with pride.

He describes what will be in for the coming season.

"Black, of course, earth tones, dark burgundy, grey, soft-toned shirts, creams, pinks, co-ordinated ties," he says.

Korman touches the merchandise as he strolls through his spacious store, fondly stroking a cashmere coat, pointing to a comfortable sports jacket. Korry's carries everything in suits, from tailored to casual, but he emphasizes that while there is a place for each style, the tailored look gives a message that commands respect.

Among noted sports stars who have patronized Korry's are Doug Gilmour and Wendel Clark.

Korman encourages young men to be aware of how to dress well. He recently spoke to a group of hockey players, between the ages of 16 and 22, about fashion basics. Among noted sports stars who have patronized Korry's are Doug Gilmour, Wendel Clark, David Wells, Tom Henke, Devon White, Pinball Clemens and Elvis Stojko. Radio and TV personalities include Bob McGown, Gord Stellick, Jim Duthie and Peter Kent. Entertainer Donny Osmond and actor Christopher Plummer have also chosen Korry's.

We walk past fine leather belts, scarves, raincoats, Colehann shoes, sales racks featuring exceptional markdowns on outgoing merchandise and we reach the entrance. Korman stops in the doorway, impeccable in his tailored suit, a glint in his eye, a grin on his face, a happy man doing what he loves well.

CLOTHES FOR 'HUSKY BOYS':

Crawford Boys, a store at the Lawrence Plaza in Toronto that specializes in clothing for boys ages 4-16, now also carries clothes designed for children who are overweight. "The inability to find properly designed, fashionable clothing often leaves these boys dressed in a manner almost guaranteed to isolate them from better dressed and fitted peers," says owner Paul Spiar. Crawford Boys orders a wide range of dress and casual clothing which is specifically designed for boys who require these sizes. If a style is not offered, such as husky cargo pants, Crawford Boys designs and produces them "in house."

September rules to live by

By RANDI BERGMAN
Special to The CJN

It's that time of year again when we are bombarded with many trends in fashion. September is such a hectic time, it might seem impossible to do right in the fashion world. To help push the anxious into the change rooms, I've compiled a list of rules:

• Trends are fabulous, but avoid looking too overdone.

I know how hard it is not to salivate over each and every item that falls on store hangers, but there is such a thing as looking tacky, trust me. Trends change faster than you can say Dolce & Gabbana, and therefore it is not proper to spend all your dough on them.

There are some trends that are meant to make you look a certain way, and the worst thing you can do is to make them into math homework – complicated and overdone.

My point is similar with many trends, but mind you, there are exceptions. Go wild with colours and fabrics and wear hockey socks with stilettos, except not when you want to look like Joey Potter.

• Be smart about shoes.

I guarantee that a good pair of shoes will last you longer than your latest hair colour.

Don't get me wrong, I'd never dare to say that you should own merely one pair, because I, the owner of at least a dozen pairs, would be a hypocrite! And no, comfort is not an issue with me.

Buy shoes, and then buy more and more, but just make sure you have one pair of great shoes that you'll still want to wear when you're finally out of high school!

• Dress properly for the occasion at hand.

It might just be me, but it seems all too often I notice people who are improperly dressed.

I'll never understand why women come to my all-female gym, all faputzed, looking just like J. Lo, only to sweat like a pig along with everyone else.

On the other hand, I notice when people are underdressed as well. I haven't the slightest idea who said wearing sweatpants to a party was cool. Really, it's just not.

• Vintage is not an exact science.

If you're looking to add some spice into your otherwise bland wardrobe, I suggest vintage. There are so many places in Toronto to hit for vintage gear. These stores make it possible to raid closets of the sibling you never had while not having to search through thrift stores.

Personally, I only take vintage so far. I think it's kinda nasty to wear someone else's fur coat, but I do own a collection of shirts, belts and hats.

Everyone has their own opinion on how they like their vintage, so I suggest trying Kensington Market and deciding for yourself!

• Don't buy based on brand names.

I love designer names to death and I'd love to own everything in Vogue, but I won't spend all my money just based on the name tag.

If you actually want what you are about to buy, go for it! But if you're going to shell out serious money for nothing much, think again.

To sum up, the fashion world is more confusing than you'd think. The last thing you need is a fashion faux-pas when you're busy fasting on Yom Kippur and finishing essays!

The Beauty Bible combats cosmetic counter confusion

By ELAINE COHEN

Cosmetic companies constantly churn out innovative products to enhance the beauty of consumers of all ages. People are bombarded by so many goodies in alluring hues that they become confused.

That is one of the reasons author and consumer activist Paula Begoun recently provided readers with an update in the second edition of her book, The Beauty Bible (distributed by Raincoast Books in Canada).

Begoun covers everything from acne to wrinkles. Although women's makeup and grooming are her prime focus, she also includes chapters devoted to men, babies and animal rights.

So much more is known in today's scientific world than in the past about products, health and skin care, the author/journalist explains in the introduction.

"When I started [the second edition], I never realized I would need to rewrite 75 per cent of the book," said Begoun. Among her other cosmetic guides are Blue Eyeshadow Should Be Illegal, five editions of Don't go to the Cosmetics Counter without Me and two editions of Don't go Shopping for Hair Care Products Without Me.

Author advises women to throw out mascara every three-to-six months

Begoun spent more than two decades working behind cosmetic counters and she is accustomed to interacting with consumers. Furthermore, she knows how major players operate in the cosmetics industry. In addition to appearing on television talk shows, she writes on the subject for print and online publications.

Her interest in cosmetics began when she became dissatisfied as an acne-prone adolescent. Begoun made it her business to help others as well as herself. Now that her books have sold in the millions, one may say she has accomplished her mission. Fortunately for consumers, she remains intrinsically involved.

The new edition of the Beauty Bible, an informative 510-page guide, tackles products and problems affecting the body from head to toe. Topics include cosmetics cop; understanding the hype; miracles, frauds, and facts; skin care basics for everyone; sun sense; skin-care planning; skin-care battle plans; battle plans for wrinkles; battle plans for dry skin; battle plans for blemishes; battle plans for wounds and scars; common skin disorders; hair removal; cosmetic surgery; men's skin care; baby skin care; body and nail care; makeup application, step by step; problems, solutions; animal rights.

Unlike many how-to guides, this is more than a quick read that people will part with and never leaf through again. Instead, readers are bound to refer to different topics from time to time.

Begoun lists 10 commandments. One deals with high-price products. "More expensive doesn't mean it's better," she writes.

According to FDA (Federal Drug Administration) regulations, every ingredient except fragrance must be listed on a product. If you develop sensitivity to any skin-care product or cosmetic, stop using it and consult your physician, Begoun advises.

As far as how long one should keep cosmetics, she says it depends on a lot of factors. However, she strongly advises women to throw out mascara every three to six months because it has a short shelf life and it's not worth risking an eye infection.

The section on miracles, frauds and facts is interesting, even if you don't care about cosmetic products. Begoun discusses hormone replacement therapy (HRT), creams, grape extract, vitamin K and spider veins, yeast, herbs and algae.

Begoun underlines the importance of treating the skin with respect – be gentle and take good care of it. Avoid extremes of hot and cold. She doesn't believe moisturizer is for everyone but agrees it benefits women with dry skin. An excellent moisturizer contains sunscreen, emollients (lubricating ingredients), waterbinding agents and anti-irritants (ingredients to reduce irritants skin is exposed to daily.)

Throughout the text, Begoun cites bona fide sources before rattling off rules. She provides formulas to battle skin-care problems for those with sensitive skin and allergies. Moreover, she debunks the myth that wrinkles only occur on dry skin. Readers receive an update on different forms of cosmetic surgery; for example, cellulite treatment for eyelids.

Women can follow her step-by-step makeup plan, which is embellished with illustrations.

Here is a sample of Begoun's words of wisdom: If your lipstick has a tendency to cake or dry out during the day, avoid simply adding another layer. Make sure to take off the caked layer first. You may wish to add lip balm under your lipstick, if caking persists.

If you use lipliner, avoid a pronounced demarcation in a different shade. For thin lips, use vibrant shades but avoid darker colours because they make the lips look harsh.

Co-ordinate blush and lipstick hues. Foundation should match skin exactly, says Begoun, adding concealer should be a shade or two lighter than foundation.

Many women will appreciate Begoun's chapter on "feeling beautiful during the trauma of cancer treatment." It hit home, when her sister underwent chemotherapy. "Gentle" is the best word to describe Begoun's tips. The skin is sensitive after chemotherapy and radiation; therefore, stay clear of hot baths, strong soaps, and loofahs. She advocates wearing silk underwear and sleeping on silk sheets.

Women worried about hair loss during chemotherapy should visit the shatelmacher (wigmaker). "The shatelmacher is a mainstay of the Orthodox community," says Begoun, "and she knows better than anyone how to make a wig look natural and attractive."

After receiving positive e-mail, the author is convinced the "look good and feel better" concept works. For a sample of Paula Begoun's writing, visit www.CosmeticsCop.com.

Jewish Television series still a dream, for now

By DAVID SILVERBERG
Special to The CJN

As far as Miriam Porter can remember, she has never seen an entire television series devoted to Canadian Jews. So the Toronto resident is pursuing a dream to produce a series called Jewish Television.

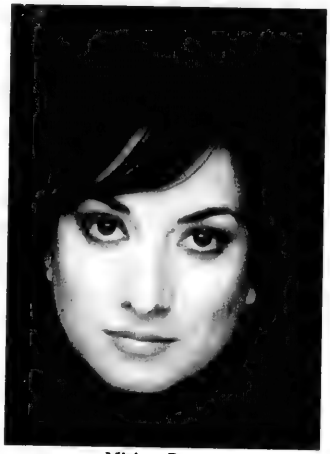
While the 29-year-old has received tremendous support for the series, dubbed J:TV, from the Jewish community and has enlisted the assistance of editors and directors, financial backing is still a problem. She also has yet to find a broadcaster, but a pilot will be available by the end of the summer.

But Porter, who was inspired by her conversations with director Steven Spielberg when she worked in Los Angeles on his Survivors of the Shoah Foundation, is clinging to her dream and says she is on her way to success.

She says the series, which she's been working on for a year, would be suitable for non-Jewish viewers, although J:TV would stress Holocaust survivor stories and Jewish entertainment.

"J:TV can give kids of all cultures people to look up to," Porter says, nibbling on a muffin at Mars Uptown Restaurant near Yonge Street and Eglinton Avenue.

Porter has already tasted success on numerous occasions. Acting in television as young as 15, Porter worked in theatre and commercials through her high school days at Earl Haig Secondary School. After attending York University, she moved to Los Angeles in 1997. When friends and family told her she would be another starving actress, she ignored them, staying in L.A. for four years.



Miriam Porter

She says her most memorable moments were her days as a guest star on Becker – several of her scenes included an intense argument with Becker star Ted Danson.

But when she worked with Spielberg on his Holocaust series, his energy inspired her to brainstorm a series on Jewish life. Along with director Jennifer Podemski (another Toronto actress), Porter began working on a series to represent the Jewish past, present and future.

"I know I have to do this," Porter says. "I have a strong commitment to get some messages across."

She says the format of the half-hour show is in multiple segments: the first two minutes will shoot Jewish "streeters" speaking on various issues, followed by the main eight-minute interview, which will centre on an individual's accomplishments.

A rotating segment will follow, focusing either on an entertainment or on a lifestyle topic. The next eight-minute section will revolve around a Holocaust survivor. An animal advocate segment will round off the show, with the help of Porter's sister at the Toronto Wildlife Centre. Porter is planning to tape a total of 13 shows.

As producer and host, Porter is looking for grant money from Canadian Jewish institutions. While she has injected some of her own funds into the project, she realizes that a television series in Canada can only get off the ground with hefty financial assistance.

"But everyone is so supportive," she says, citing letters of support from organizations such as B'nai Brith Canada and Associated Hebrew Schools of Toronto.

In the meantime, she says J:TV must become a reality so the next generation can know about Jewish culture. Since kids devour television more voraciously than the Talmud, Porter's medium could be the appropriate delivery tool.

After every grant rejection, Porter pushes harder to reach her goal of bringing this series to the public. She sees her drive as similar to the hero in her favourite book Jonathan Livingstone Seagull by Richard Bach.

"It's about going past your limits," she says, "and not letting anything stand in your way."

To contact Porter and J:TV, e-mail jtv toronto@hotmail.com.

Sing-along-with Tevye

Today, Aug. 29, Harbourfront will be re-invented as a village in Czarist Russia. And if your moviegoing experience usually involves sitting back, watching the film and munching on popcorn, this evening will be something different.

This is the night when the audience is the star, as Sing-A-Long Fiddler on the Roof returns to Harbourfront's outdoor screen at 8 p.m.

Dress as your favourite character – including babushkas, beards and wedding veils – and be prepared to sing along (don't worry, the words will be on the screen). Prizes will be awarded for best costumes.

David Gale, host of the W Network cooking show Loving Spoonfuls, will host and lead the vocal warm-up.

Tickets are $10 and are available from Miles Nadal JCC, 750 Spadina Ave., 416-924-6211, and the Harbourfront box office, 235 Queens Quay W., 416-973-4000.

Songs of the Jewish Shtel

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

You don't have to be Russian to enjoy an evening of traditional Yiddish songs performed by Efim Aleksandrov, a famous Russian performer and singer, and 35 other talented Russian dancers, singers and musicians.

Aleksandrov, a Benny Hill look-alike, headlines Songs of Jewish Shtetl, at The Music Hall, 147 Danforth Ave., on Wednesday, Sept. 4 at 8 p.m.

Efim Aleksandrov

The lone Toronto performance is part of a 16-city North American tour. It follows a European tour that received rave reviews in Russia, Germany and Israel.

Aleksandrov not only sings and dances in the show, he is also its artistic director and co-creator, along with Yan Ashkinazy.

The ensemble performs a huge, colourful and creative production dedicated to the preservation of Jewish culture in Yiddish.

The repertoire includes famous Yiddish songs that were sung in Jewish shtetls across eastern Europe and passed down by Jewish mothers and grandmothers.

The production also features dancers in traditional costumes and comic skits.

Ella Tcheloznova, the Toronto show's producer said the show "is for the older to remember and for the younger to learn."

In its review of the production, the Moscow Courier noted that the show's songs still have a strong influence on the minds of the contemporary Jewish community.

"Many [contemporary Jews] don't know Yiddish, but the sound of the language their parents and grandparents used to speak will undoubtedly make any heart pound in unison with the rediscovered and everlasting tunes."

Ashkinazy, the show's co-creator, has also produced a CD titled Songs of the Jewish Mestechko, consisting of folk songs composed in Jewish mestechkos (small settlements) scattered across Russia, Ukraine, Moldova, the Baltics states, Poland and Romania.

For tickets to Songs of Jewish Shtetl, call 416-491-3014 or 416-226-9151.

Machu Picchu: Trek to the Lost City of the Incas

Every day is a history lesson as we piece together the puzzle of the peak

By LISA ABRAM
Special to The CJN

LA PAZ, Bolivia — I meet my fellow travellers as they arrive in La Paz, Bolivia, the world's highest capital city at 12,000 feet. The backpackers on this trek have flown in from various places around the globe, and for some, their time travelling has been measured in days, not hours.

Our goal is to reach Machu Picchu in Peru – the Peruvian name for the Lost City of the Incas – which is located in the town of Aguas Calientes.

We start in La Paz because it allows us time to adjust to the altitude before we ascend to 17,000 feet a week later. Preparing for a trip of this nature is not without its potential dangers. Altitude sickness can affect, without warning, even those who are in superb athletic condition.

La Paz is a kaleidoscope of colours. Bolivian women stroll through the city carrying their wares to the market in brightly coloured blankets with the ease of a lifetime of practice.

Meanwhile, still uncertain about our own physical limitations during this acclimatization period, we adjust to the thinner air with reasonable caution.

Our tour leader is Roberto, a Peruvian from Cuzco with over 10 years experience as a tour guide. He is articulate, educated and passionate about his work. He demonstrates an understanding of each of our needs. His livelihood is dependent upon delivering an experience that exceeds everyone's expectations and one that promises a safe return home.

On day three of the trip, we board a bus heading for Copacabana, a religious pilgrimage town for the country's faithful, and Lake Titicaca, the world's highest navigable lake. We head higher up into the Andean mountain range towards 13,000 feet. By now, the entire group has acclimatized. The usual symptoms of altitude sickness, light-headedness and nausea pass within the first 48 hours.

The tour leader is fully aware of the state of his charges, much like a shepherd who meticulously tends to his flock.

To better prepare us for the week ahead, six days of camping and high altitude trekking in the Andean mountains, he suggests we negotiate an hour climb while in Copacabana. The air is thinner here than in La Paz, and the challenge is to climb to the top of a small hill breathing less oxygen.

When we arrive that evening in the town of Puno, located on the railway line, we're lucky to see the local people celebrating the birth of a patron saint, and we admire the colourful tapestries and Peruvian artistry at this huge street party.

The next day, we board the train from Puno to Cuzco, an 11-hour journey that traverses the countryside, revealing scenery more reminiscent of a lunar landscape: dry, barren and mountainous.

Cuzco is a visual masterpiece, with inspiring Inca ruins and magnificent Spanish churches all forming the backdrop on a canvas surrounded by orange-tiled roofs. We spend the next three days exploring the surrounding area: white-water rafting on the Vilcanota River and visiting the Sacred Valley of the Incas.

The next four day's activities in the Andes reveal snow-capped mountains, unbelievable vistas and ancient water canals, all unspoiled by tourism. Time to ourselves allows for quiet reflection and wonderment. How small we feel surrounded by nature's unspeakable glory.

It's at this point we fully comprehend the reason why we started our trip in La Paz. Any prior difficulties we encountered acclimatizing to the thin air have truly paid off here. We're ascending higher each day, starting at 10,000 feet and slowly climbing our way up to 17,000 feet. On day three of the trek, we will conquer the summit of a glacial saddle nestled near the top of the Salcantay Mountain.

As we cross the glacial saddle midday, it feels as if we've been on a pilgrimage. We have all pushed ourselves further physically and mentally than ever before. Roberto informs us the mountain is alive with movement and we stand still to feel its presence. We place rocks at the summit to give thanks to the Pacha Mama, the mother earth. We're overwhelmed by this spiritual experience and climb out of the saddle with ropes, daydreaming, yet fully aware there are still ice crevasses to manoeuvre around.

The physical beauty of the Andes offsets the physical exertion of climbing towards the heavens. While sharing the Inca trail with local alpacas and llamas, the realities of trekking become obvious. As we continue up the steps, we are overwhelmed by a pungent odour. A backpacker examines the bottom of her boot to discover the remnants from a four-legged passerby. Humility and humour are definitely close cousins on this trek.

As we get closer to Machu Picchu we visit many Inca ruins along the trail. Every day is a history lesson from Roberto as he pieces together for us the puzzle of the peak.

On the final day of the trek, we ascend to the top of a crest on a particularly hot day to finally see that we've made it. We feel an incredible sense of accomplishment. Some celebrate with whiskey, others stand or sit down in awe. We all agree it was worth the toil and sweat. A celebration is planned that night.

In the morning, we take a four-hour train ride back to Cuzco where we spend our last night and quietly reflect on the last two weeks.

We fly to Lima, the capital city of Peru, for the final leg of the trip and bid farewell to South America and each other before we return home, promising to return some day to relive the magic of discovering ourselves high up in the Andean mountains.

For more information about the trip, which is called the Inca Highlands Trek, contact The Adventure Centre at 416-922-7584 or visit www.theadventurecentre.com.

Anaheim pitcher not keen on being a spot-starter

By ELI SHUPAK
Special to The CJN

Anaheim Angels reliever Al Levine says he'd prefer not to take the mound during the upcoming High Holy Days, but the 6-foot-3 righthander isn't one of those guys who can just say he's not pitching on a given day.

Al Levine

Levine is currently trying to recapture the set-up role he held with the club for the first half of the season, getting the ball into closer Troy Percival's hands with the lead in the ninth inning.

Levine had a breakthrough season last year, emerging as the team's primary set-up man while making a career-high 64 appearances (one start) and posting a team-low 2.38 ERA. The team sent him home on Yom Kippur prior to a game in Oakland, but he's not in a position these days to request time away from the ball club, even for the holiest day on the Jewish calendar.

In his first seven appearances since being activated off the disabled list on July 20, the seven-year major league veteran did not allow an earned run in 12 innings pitched. However, he was used in only one situation with the game still in doubt, after returning to the lineup from a three-week absence due to right shoulder tendinitis.

Levine declined to comment about the way the Angels are using him in their pursuit of a playoff berth, but it was clear he wasn't keen on being a spot-starter down the stretch.

"I don't see it in the future," said Levine, a free agent after the season. "But if it happens, it happens. I mean I'm not gonna sit there and say no.

"Our starters are good and there are guys at Triple-A who can do the job.

"September's coming along soon and the rosters expand anyway so who's to say they won't be one of those guys (spot-starting)."

The 34-year-old Levine met with manager Mike Scioscia and pitching coach Bud Black early in the month to talk about his role on the wild-card-leading Angels' pitching staff.

"There are a couple of things we're looking at," said Scioscia. "He's an option for us to be a spot-starter, so we're keeping him lengthened out whenever we get the chance.

"At the same token, when he's throwing the ball as effectively as he's shown, we want to look for a spot to use him along with [Ben] Weber, [Brendan] Donnelly, [Scott] Schoeneweis, depending on match-ups and who's fresh in the seventh or eighth inning."

A sinker and slider pitcher, the 11th-round pick of the Chicago White Sox in the 1991 draft struggled for a number of years in the minors before getting the call to make his big league debut on June 22, 1996.

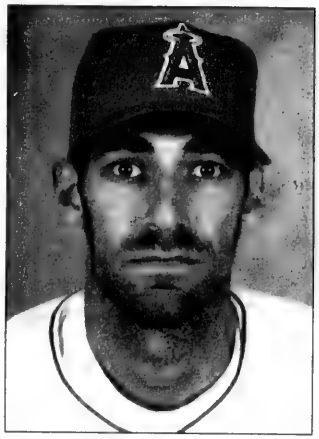
The highlight of his baseball career prior to that came in 1994 when he got to play with Michael Jordan on the Double-A Birmingham Barons.

He admits playing so close to home in Chicago was extremely difficult in his two years with the Sox.

"I was up and down (from the minors) and I was terrible," said Levine, a Park Ridge, Ill. native. "I really hated (playing there). If anyone has to play in their hometown, it's more of a pain because everyone always wants something and is always trying to get in touch with you. To me those are just more distractions that you don't need."

His career improved when he was traded to Texas following the 1997 season. Levine spent his first full season in the majors with the Rangers the next year, helping the club qualify for post-season play.

Texas released him early in the 1999 campaign and Levine signed on as a free agent with Anaheim. He's been pitching for the Angels ever since.



"He's steadily grown into a more impact role on our club," said Black, a former Blue Jays hurler.

"Since we've had him he just seems to be more comfortable on the mound. He understands his game and what he has to do. You know, [with] some guys, it just takes longer."

Essay contest

The Jewish Sports Connection, a periodical that promotes the discussion of sport and Jewish life, is extending the deadline for its essay contest to Oct. 15.

The essay topic is : "How has Judaism enriched my life in sport? How has sport enriched my life as a Jew?"

The best entries, selected by a panel of judges, will be awarded Israel Bonds of $500, $360 and $180 (US).

Contest guidelines and essay submission forms can be obtained by sending a self-addressed, stamped envelope to The Jewish Sports Connection, P.O. Box 66461, St. Petersburg, FLA. 33736, U.S.A. or by making an online request at JewishSports@yahoo.com.

The contest is open to Jewish high school and college students with significant involvement in organized team or individual sports.

Israel kicks off new era with 4-2 victory

Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

KAUNAS, Lithuania — Israel beat Lithuania 4-2 in an international friendly in Kaunas last week, giving Avraham Grant a winning start to his tenure as national team coach. Not only did Grant get a win in his first game in charge, but two players making their international debuts were on the scoresheet for Israel.

Watched by just 2,000 fans, Israel got off to a decidedly shaky start, and within 10 minutes, the home team had taken the lead.

A corner was lofted over from the left and Arturos Fomenka rose above the Israeli defence to head past Dudu Awat. Ten minutes later, Israel was back on even terms, as Omri Afek celebrated his first cap in style. Haim Revivo sent a long ball from the centre of the pitch over several Lithuanian defenders and Afek latched on to the ball, rounded the keeper and stroked the ball into the empty net.

With the Israeli defence struggling against the home team's attackers, it came as no surprise when Lithuania took a 2-1 lead at the half-hour mark. A mistake by Ilan Bachar allowed a Lithuanian winger to cross from the left, and when the ball evaded the Israeli defenders, Robertas Poskus was on hand to stab home from close range.

The second half was an entirely different affair, following the introduction of another newcomer, Michael Zandberg. His pace, control and flair were the difference between a poor Israeli showing in the first half and a confident performance in the second.

Israel's second equalizer came three minutes after the restart, as Zandberg received a deep pass from Kfir Udi, left two defenders in his wake and scored past the stranded Lithuanian goalkeeper.

In the 64th minute, Afek completed a superb personal performance by scoring Israel's third and his second goal. Substitute Alon Harazi crossed from the right, Udi's volley was parried by the keeper, and Afek had the presence of mind to turn the rebound back into the Lithuanian goal.

Israel saved the best goal for last. In the 74th minute, Udi crossed from the right of the Lithuanian penalty box, Walid Badir headed the ball back across the penalty box, and Idan Tal headed from close range to give Israel the 4-2 win.

Addressing the players during training prior to the contest, Israel Football Association (IFA) chair Gavri Levi urged them to turn around the run of disappointments that has seen Israel fail to qualify for a major soccer championship since 1970.

"From now on," said Levi, "you have to work harder than ever and fight with all your strength for the country. Hard work will help you achieve your goal – reaching the finals of Euro 2004. You can do it."

In a lighthearted aside, Levi said the injuries that had left Grant without three starters could work to the new coach's advantage. "At least he won't have any trouble selecting his team," Levi joked.

Lithuanian coach Benjamin Zelkevicius told Israeli reporters his squad was in the early stages of readiness for its own Euro 2004 qualifying campaign. In its last game, in March, Lithuania came away with a 1-0 win over Moldova. Zelkevicius added that in a friendly tournament in Malta over the summer, his team was beaten 3-0 by Jordan.

"I know the Israeli team very well because of Maccabi Haifa's Lithuanian defender, Raymundas Zatauttas, who is my captain," said Zelkevicius. "He has told me all about Israeli soccer and has made it clear that despite the absence of Yossi Benayoun and Avi Nimni, you have a very strong team headed by Haim Revivo, who is famous even here in Lithuania.

"Even though we have home field advantage, I think the current Israeli team is even better than the one that beat us here 3-2 last year. There's no doubt that Richard Nielsen left behind a strong basis and that Israel is a team that demands respect."

Israeli footballers humbled in international tournament

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

If they had appeared on an episode of The Sopranos, you could say the Israeli flag football team got "whacked" but good.

On Star Trek, phasers would have been set far beyond "stun" and if it had been the CFL, fans would have been bellowing Arrrrrgggggos! long before the final snap.

Instead it was merely a flag football tournament and nobody got killed, though there was plenty of embarrassment to go around.

Playing more talented squads from Canada, the United States and Greece (consisting of Canadian-born players of Greek origin), Israel was humbled, to put it mildly.

Israel lost its bronze medal game 35-0 to the United States, and finished 0-4 at the recently concluded Flag Bowl 2002, held at York University. Canada finished first and Greece second in the event, sanctioned by the Global Federation of American Football.

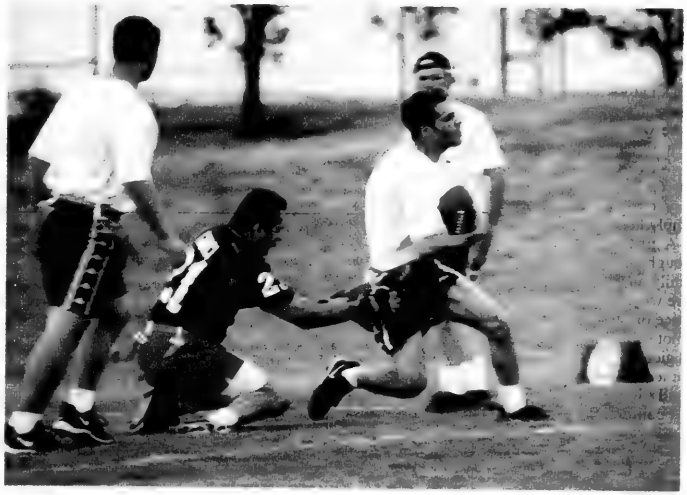
Israel's performance was disappointing, to say the least, as the boys in blue had in previous international tournaments shown they were at least competitive with second tier football countries, like Mexico, Italy, Brazil and France.

This time, however, none of the also-rans showed up to play (the Mexicans, originally scheduled to play, were held up in Mexico due to visa difficulties) and Israel was left as the flyweight in a heavyweight contest. Perhaps the other countries knew something Israel didn't.

Still and all, head coach Danny Gewirtz presented a positive spin on the team's Toronto experience. The team had moved the ball against Greece, he said, scoring 26 points though allowing 48, but the Canadians had steamrollered them, 42-6.

"We know what we have to do to raise our level to that of North America...Against them, we don't match up well," he said, noting the Canadians' and Americans' team speed and knowledge of the seven-man, no contact game.

Even before the tournament, Gewirtz and team manager Steve Leibowitz knew they'd have trouble with the North Americans. They pointed to the 15-yard drops the Canadian quarterback would take and the fact the Canuck QB had a rocket for an arm, making it difficult to defend against a pass on a field that's 53-yards wide.



Open field running was tough against the American flag football team, as this Israeli ball carrier discovered recently. [Adam Irving photo]

What's more, Israel has always done better in the contact version of the game (the Flag Bowl was a non-contact tournament).

At the World Cup of Flag Football, held last February in Ft. Lauderdale Fla., Israel defeated England and recorded a 1-3 record. In Le Havre last May, in an event attended by 26 teams, Israel finished third. Those, however, were contact tournaments.

Organized football has been played in Israel for 13 years, ever since Gewirtz and Leibowitz, American olim, founded the American Touch Football in Israel (ATFI) league.

Giants fans since their days in Queen's, NY, they had always missed football while living in Israel. When they started the league back then, it consisted of 100 players on eight teams. It has subsequently grown to 700 players on 36 teams, including many visiting yeshiva students.

Ten of Israel's best travelled to Toronto for the games and surprisingly, five of them were native-born Israelis.

Each year, more and more sabras are getting involved in the league, Gewirtz said. "They're getting good. It's definitely catching on."

Elik Cohen is one of the young Israelis who loves the North American game. A native of Jerusalem, Cohen played point guard for Hapoel Jerusalem, the city's professional basketball team, before an injury ended his career.

He took up flag football only three months ago and after three weeks of getting used to catching a spiraling oval ball, became one of the country's best players. He was named MVP in Israel's bronze medal blowout in Toronto.

Prior to playing flag football, he had seen only some Super Bowls on TV. "I had no idea it was so much fun. It surprised me very much.

"I think it's one of the smartest games," he continued. His favourite part of the game is scoring and "stealing (intercepting) the ball."

Aryeh Bauman is an American-born member of the team who's lived in Israel for 14 years. During his North American football career, he bounced from college to college and even had a three-month stint with the Argos during the 1994 season. The highlight of his stay here, before suffering a foot injury, was sacking then-Stampeder quarterback Doug Flutie on a safety blitz.

The sport is catching on in the Holy Land. "Israelis like the physical aspect," said Bauman, a top arm wrestler, who's ranked third in the world in the 80 kg class.

Israel's football program was given a considerable boost by the philanthropy of American supporters. A few years ago, the league approached Robert Kraft, owner of the Super Bowl champion New England Patriots and a supporter of Israel, and he agreed to fund development of a four-dunam piece of land in central Jerusalem to serve as the league's home field. The rock-strewn land, near Gan Sacher Park, was donated by the municipality of Jerusalem.

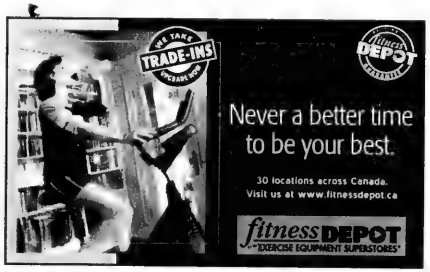
The NFL, meanwhile, kicks in $7,500 (US) per year to support the league and Kraft, along with fellow owner Art Rooney of the Pittsburgh Steelers have floated the idea of a home and away exhibition played in Ireland and Israel. But the NFL won't allow it, given Israel's security situation, Leibowitz said.

The league plays all its games at Kraft Stadium, including the season-ending Holy Land Bowl, and the field is rented for other sports as well.

Football is proving to be more than a good recreational activity, Leibowitz said. The sport has been introduced to young Ethiopians, Russians, Iranians and Israelis and it creates bonds between them. "It's a way to integrate them into society," he said.

The team's participation in the Toronto tournament was made possible by grants of $5,000 (US) from B'nai Brith Canada and $7,500 from UJA Federation, as well as contributions from supporters in the United States. Roots provided the team with uniforms.

During their visit, QB Ron Dermer, a columnist with the Jerusalem Post, addressed the congregations at two synagogues.



Renewing yourself

Many people my age have likely been going to shul in some capacity for 20 or so years on Rosh Hashanah and Yom Kippur. Through years of observing the High Holy Days in our own ways, we have likely each experienced their significance in one way or another.

For some, this time may be deeply religious or spiritual. For others, it may represents a break in their routine for renewal, a special time to be with family, or perhaps the only time of year when they feel particularly Jewish. Some might resent these holidays, having being forced to go to shul or to pray to a God that they didn't believe in simply because they were born Jewish.

A girlfriend recently told me that although she goes to synagogue with her family on the High Holy Days, she is not sure why. In fact, she questions the relevance of the holidays to her because she is not sure how she wants to incorporate religion into her life. Yet at the same time, she identifies strongly with being "culturally Jewish."

I completely understand her point of view.

The questioning of faith is quite normal. In fact, on Rosh Hashanah, we read the story of Sarah and Hagar and the story of God's testing of Abraham in the Akedah, which both raise issues about the questioning of faith. So, if you were to ask me if I think you have to be religious to benefit from the High Holy Days, I would say no.

The High Holy Days have a lot to offer us in our journeys of self discovery. Rosh Hashanah encourages us to examine our behaviours, relationships and priorities, as well as how we treat ourselves. In the days that follow, we take responsibility, mend and forgive. We also figure out how we can learn from our mistakes of the past year and how we can make positive changes in our lives.

Then, by giving up something on Yom Kippur – whether we choose to fast completely or simply give up some luxury as a form of personal sacrifice – we can all become aware of how lucky we are. We experience empathy for those less fortunate than us. We might also connect more deeply to God or if not to him, then certainly to ourselves.

20 something

By Jodi Kovitz

I know a wise young woman who is very spiritual, though not very religious or very observant. She wrote the following to me:

"You know Jodi, the High Holy Days are so for our age group. Our 20s are often so tumultuous because we are usually solidifying who we are. We make life changing decisions (like choosing careers and life partners) and many of us are often dealing with difficult issues like sickness or death for the first time.

"These holidays have become part of my self definition and healing process [in battling anorexia]. I feel renewed, and am then able to keep going. This is what I think these days are meant to do... help us grow and reaffirm our commitment to life."

I could not have said it better. I hope that you can find some meaning in the High Holy Days this year. Perhaps the experience can make your journeys a little easier. And in addition to what we stand to gain personally, let's unite to help our 20-something friends in Israel. Perhaps while we are fasting, we can think of them and send them our collective feelings of compassion, empathy and renewed hope.

Thanks to all of you who have helped to shape my thinking this month. Our dialogue to date has been outstanding, and I continue to welcome your contributions at jlkovitz@hotmail.com.

Epi on Education

Seymour Epstein

Several educators have made the point that Jewish education in 20th-century western countries was modelled too closely on public schooling. The argument is that the public classroom is a fairly recent innovation in the long history of education, and Jewish learning thrived in many different settings for centuries without reference to the public mode of teaching. Isn't it possible that we should be looking inward and backward to search for modes more authentic to our own heritage?

Of course, there is a double danger in this type of exercise. One, we might over-romanticize models that were neither efficient nor effective. Two, we could fall into the trap of dismissing an acceptable idea just because of its newness and "modernity." With those caveats in mind, it seems to make sense to ask if, in fact, there are other modes of learning that could, at least, complement the formal schooling we now depend on.

A recent training seminar run by the UJA Federation Board of Jewish Education's Mishpacha Institute of Toronto, was based on the idea that the Jewish family is a sine qua non for Jewish learning and identity.

So much of the last 100 years of organized Jewish education isolated children from their families instead of integrating the whole family into the process. There was a cartoon some years back of an irate father yelling at his son, "You'll go to shul Saturday morning even if I have to take you there myself!!"

Another aspect of Jewish learning that existed in the past and can easily be recast in our world is the visible adult learner. Children should see their parents studying Jewish sources. Children do see their parents taking advantage of the other skills they learn in school, using math, reading, making sense of the outside world. If Jewish subject matter is to be relevant to children as they mature, they must see adults appreciating the same material on an adult level. That simple act of seeing a parent studying Torah, reading a volume of Jewish history or enjoying an Israeli novel adds reality to the built-in artificiality of schooling.

Even our schools could search for ways to connect to old modes of study that might be more suited to Jewish subject matter: form in concert with content. More on that in future columns...

Epi (Seymour Epstein) is the vice-president of Jewish Education at UJA Federation of Greater Toronto.

Life after 9/11

Editorial

It was an ordinary late summer morning, and I was on my way to an interview. I stopped for a coffee, and that's when the first of two planes crashed into the World Trade Center. I am not unique in remembering nearly a year later exactly where I was and what I was doing when the news broke that grim Sept. 11. Most of us do, just as those of us who are old enough remember what we were doing when president John F. Kennedy was assassinated.

Each time, it felt as if nothing would ever be the same again.

It wasn't long after that the new intifadah seemed to reach a new level of brutality and news of suicide bombings stopped being breaking news.

Acts of anti-Semitism, from graffiti to vandalism to the burning of synagogues – things that always happened "somewhere else" – began happening here, too.

No wonder we became unsettled and afraid, unsure of how to respond.

This Community Focus supplement is coming out just before the first anniversary of 9/11, as it has simply come to be called. How have we coped – both individually and as a community – over the past year?

On Sept. 11 itself, members of our community didn't hesitate to open their homes and hearts to those who were stranded at Canadian airports when American ones were closed. Transportation, telephones, kosher food, places to stay and comforting words were offered in such quantities that many who wanted to help had to be turned away.

For the first little while after 9/11, Toronto's Jews, like the rest of the world, were in shock.

Have any of us spent as much time glued to the television as we did that awful week? How often, before or since, has there been only one topic of conversation wherever you went?

As the days went by, especially as the intifadah and anti-Semitism around the world grew more strident, our reactions became more focused. Security everywhere not only increased, it became more visible. There were guards outside Mount Sinai Hospital, police and dogs outside shuls, and purses and briefcases were being searched at community events.We were afraid, and the fear showed in doctors' offices, in changed travel plans (including, for some, a refusal to travel at all) and in nightmares.

Life after Sept. 11 has been trying for Jews around the world, but for Israel it has been catastrophic. Flights have been cut back, hotels are empty and the economic outlook in the Jewish State is bleak.

Life after 9/11

An Israeli tour guide travelling through Canada recently warned of a long-term effect – that when things do turn around, the damage to the tourist infrastructure will be nearly irreparable, since many hotels and tourist attractions will have closed and experienced tour guides will have found other work.

Yet, we Jews are, in the words of the Torah "a stiff-necked people." That is not entirely a bad thing.

As we always have when trouble strikes, first we mourn and pray. Then we pick ourselves up, reclaim our sense of unity that in good times seems to elude us, and we take positive action. This supplement reflects that sense of purpose.

Missions of solidarity are increasing both in number and size. People are making a conscious effort to buy Israeli products, to fight back against anti-Israel and anti-Jewish propaganda, and to attend rallies that not only give encouragement to those who participate, but send a message to those who don't.

And just last week, thousands descended on a nondescript plaza in North York to shop at the "Israel Mall," a showcase of Israeli art, music, fashion, food and religious objects.

A group of women is also establishing an organization to encourage unity in the community through prayer, economic projects and social gatherings. This organization will cross religious, geographical and political boundaries.

Young people who planned to study at universities, yeshivot or seminaries in Israel have stifled their very natural concern, packed their duffle bags and defiantly refused to change their plans. Their courage has been acknowledged with tears and applause by Israeli staff at Ben Gurion airport.

A year later, there is still violence, hate and fear. But there are also genuine signs that Jews are coping with the trauma of Sept. 11 and reaching out to each other both here and in Israel.

That has always been the strength and glory of the Jewish people. It is our hope that this supplement will reinforce our appreciation of it.

Rejigged routes help to fill El Al planes out of Toronto

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

Tourism to Israel has been severely affected by terrorism, says David Freudman, the vice-president of sales at UniWorld Travel and Tours Inc.

But he said despite the ongoing intifadah, changes in the last year to El Al flight routes have meant that many people are still making the trip to, from and through Toronto on Israel's national airline.

Although travel figures are down overall, the new pattern of flights assures that planes flying out of Toronto are mostly filled.

El Al now operates four times a week out of Toronto. Its flights to Tel Aviv originate in Los Angeles, which helps fill up the planes, he explains. Likewise, flights from Tel Aviv to Toronto continue on to Los Angeles.

El Al is also permitted to carry local passengers between Toronto and Los Angeles and from Los Angeles to Toronto.

Due to the extension of El Al flights to Los Angeles and Air Canada's use of Toronto's Pearson International Airport as a hub, most El Al flights through Toronto are heavily booked well in advance, so Freudman suggests making reservations early to get seats at the best fares.

"Throughout the summer, there are more students and families travelling to Israel," says Freudman. "And there are a lot of missions."

He notes that B'nai Brith had a joint Christian and Jewish mission in June. "And now they are planning to do 18 more trips in the next 24 months as joint missions combining B'nai Brith and the Christians for Israel."

The theme of the missions is "Standing with victims of violence." Freudman says organizers are aiming for between 40 and 50 participants on each tour.

Despite the summer increase in travel, Freudman says the people who are going to Israel are primarily business people, those going to visit family, those travelling to a simchah or a sad occasion in their family, and some students going to yeshivot.

"There has been a reduction of Canadian students going to the special one-year programs at Israeli universities."

Many travellers, he say, are "holding back" and looking for other places to visit.

Because of the situation in Israel, Freudman says clients are turning to hotels in Europe – Italy, Switzerland, Scotland and others – that offer strictly kosher facilities.

"Some people are temporarily substituting these destinations for trips to Israel."

He emphasizes "temporarily" with the hope that individuals and families will take advantage of the exceptional travel values in Israel.

"Air fares to Israel are very competitive and hotel rates have never been as low as at present."

Quoting some of the prices of trips, he says "They are unbelievable. The tour in June with everything included cost $1,699 for a week all inclusive – the total price of air fare and hotels are in many cases lower than a seven or 14 day Caribbean vacation."

Learning a lesson about community

By ADAM GRACHNIK
CJN Intern

When I meet someone for the first time, I always ask them the same question. Maybe it's because I'm nosy, or perhaps it comes from my obsession with geography or my quest to learn about life in every corner of the world.

Regardless, I always ask people where they're from.

Interestingly enough, people are always proud to answer and often speak passionately about their "home towns" and smile at the chance to tell stories about their communities.

I love where I come from, too.

Like Kevin Arnold from the once-popular television show The Wonder Years, I have always been, and continue to be, proud of having grown up in the suburbs.

Big-block stores, houses a few feet apart, tons of kids, large parks, and friendly neighbours are some of the things that filled my suburban experience with warmth and community feeling.

Richmond Hill, and more recently Thornhill, have definitely shaped the person I have become. In the suburbs, I learned how important a strong community is.

Yet, my summer experience at The CJN has added a new dimension to that lesson.

It has reinforced something I have taken for granted for 22 years – a belief in strong Jewish communities.

From the people I have interviewed and the many great staffers at The CJN, I have gained a new appreciation for the importance of Jewish communal life and the role we all must play in it.

Adam Grachnik

Joe Burke, whom I met in Belleville while doing a story on that town's Jewish community, knows all about a strong community. He has lived in the same town for 74 years often as part of an extreme minority. He understands the importance of being Jewish and how it has affected his life, since he chose to build a Jewish identity within his community – not always an easy task.

I met Marshall Green in Barrie. He moved there from Toronto in 1973 and said he didn't understand the importance of a Jewish community until he moved away from his secure Jewish milieu. Seeing the need for a Jewish community in Barrie, he devoted money and time to build one. He succeeded and is a proud man.

I talked to Elisheva Gould who spent 10 days with Jews living in Cuba. She spoke beautifully of how proud these people are to be from Cuba. It's their home, their community – it's where they're from. While there may be very few Jews in Cuba, these people are still trying to strengthen their community.

For me, being Jewish is what I am and how I was raised.

My parents worked hard to link my brother and me to the Jewish community – while ensuring that we were also involved in the non-Jewish community. They also showed courage in moving our young family to Richmond Hill in 1984, where they became involved in starting a new Jewish community.

As my generation leaves our parents' nests and enters the scary world of adulthood, it is important not to take the Jewish community for granted.

Young people must continue to build the Jewish community we have been given. It isn't enough to just say we are Jewish because we're surrounded by Jews. We need to step outside our bubble and be proud of our community and who we are.

So, when annoying people, like me, ask where you're from, do you pipe up with pride? You should.

Something in your life is changing. And you need help as never before.

Diaspora Jews refuse traditional support for Jewish state

The current conflict in Israel has given rise to the articulation of some extreme anti-Israel voices in the Diaspora. CJN writers Anna Morgan and Rachael Turkienicz discuss this trend.

By ANNA MORGAN and RACHAEL TURKIENICZ

Over the summer, while many members of the Jewish community here have tried to find meaningful ways to support Israel in its current crisis, there have been a handful of Jews who have chosen to disengage from the debate completely.

Some have even added their names to boycotts and petitions against the Jewish state. For example, professors Steven Rose of The Open University, the United Kingdom's largest university, and his wife, Hillary Rose of London's City University, initiated a petition in the Guardian and in the Libération of Paris, calling for a "moratorium on European research and academic collaboration with Israeli institutions until the Israeli government opens serious peace negotiations."

In Toronto, ad-hoc Jewish groups have circulated statements on the Internet condemning Israel's occupation. But Rose, along with 45 other British Jews, has gone so far as to renounce his right of return to Israel to protest its current policies in the West Bank.

Some academics want moratorium on collaboration with Israeli institutions

Many scholars have since argued that this kind of action is counter-productive. In his article titled The Wall, which appeared in The New Republic, Yossi Klein Halevi suggests that subjecting "the Jewish state to a level of moral judgment not applied to any other nation" increases feelings of isolationism and pushes Israelis towards "the very hard-line policies" the detractors are opposing.

Growing up with stories of the Inquisition, pogroms, the Holocaust and Muslim anti-Semitism has traditionally left older Israelis convinced that every battle is about Jewish survival. The current wave of suicide bombings has rekindled this feeling among the younger generation.

The sense of despair felt in Israel as a result of the condemnation of the international community is made even worse by the rejection of the Jewish state by fellow Jews.

The connection between Israel and the Diaspora has generally been based on a partnership of need. Diaspora Jews have often found themselves actively fund-raising for the security and development of the State of Israel. On the other hand, Israel has been expected to respond to Jews facing persecution in their home countries.

In addition, during the pre-intifadah years, Israel found itself playing a more central role in educating Jewish youth about their history. As recently as two years ago, Israeli Justice Minister Yossi Beilin wrote in his book His Brother's Keeper that institutional changes need to be made to unite the Jewish people into one world and thereby strengthen the bonds of continuity.

The first Israel-Diaspora relationship began, we are told, when Jewish leaders from the tribes of Reuben and Gad asked Moses for permission to settle across the Jordan in order to pursue their livelihoods. Moses granted the request on condition that Jews living outside the borders of Israel must always be prepared to safeguard the community living within the state.

Torah calls for Diaspora support

Later, in the Book of Joshua, the Diaspora Jews built a forbidden altar, in order to preserve a link between themselves and their Israeli siblings, sparking a conflict that almost resulted in civil war. The issue was resolved when the Israeli leaders discovered that the altar was constructed as a symbol of unity based on a desire to maintain a connection for their children with Israel.

Then, as now, issues of security and continuity were central to the relationship between Israel and Jews outside of Israel, and discussion was key to resolving disputes. In ancient times, dialogue led to resolution, averting the initial armed response to what was merely a perceived dilemma.

It has always been an admirable part of the Jewish historical experience for members of the community to engage in discussion. However, it has also been important to engage in educated debate guided by objectivity and open minds.

Today, Rose and those who share his views are opting to respond to the messages they are receiving from one perspective, instead of participating in an investigation that would lead to a solution.

While the relationship between the Jews of Israel and the Diaspora has always been complex, the association has focused on ongoing dialogue – sometimes strained but always present.

Today, Jews are bombarded with troublesome images and propaganda. A few have chosen to withhold their usual financial contributions to Israel because they are disturbed by what they see in the media. They have disengaged from the debate.

These voices have chosen unilateral action over dialogue. They have also elected to criticize Israeli government policies and express their sympathy for the Palestinians in a way that rejects any internal Jewish discussion.

How many of these Jewish extremists have actually visited Israel in the past few months to dialogue with its citizens, or listened openly to alternative points of view on every side of the issue?

Anyone who has been to Israel recently will have experienced the appreciation that Israelis show to those who come to simply listen to what they have to say.

Those Jews who are inclined to disengage themselves from Israel act as if this is the only way to express their political dissent or to respond to the suffering of the Palestinian people in the current dispute. But in so doing, they are abandoning the bargain that has anchored Israel-Diaspora relations ever since Moses struck the deal with Reuben and Gad.

OMER YAVETS: DETERMINED TO SUCCEED

While guarding an IDF position in northern Israel following the Lebanon war, Omer Yavets went to investigate an unusual sound nearby. He was ambushed and walked into open enemy fire. Omer was severly wounded and his many injuries left him confined to a wheelchair forever.

In a struggle to live the life that was given back to him, Omer was determined not to allow his disabilities to stop him. He studied law, opened a practice; and joined Beit Halochem's dance troupe "Hora Galgalim". It was at Beit Halochem in Tel Aviv where he met his wife, Sima, who was volunteering at the Centre.

Today, Omer visits Beit Halochem regularly where he receives treatment and participates in many sport activities. Beit Halochem still assists Omer on his difficult road to recovery and rehabilitation — it serves as a second home, a place where he feels comfortable and can be himself.

Aid to Disabled Veterans of Israel, Beit Halochem Canada reaches out to the 50,000 disabled veterans of Israel and victims of terror — giving them the best care and rehabilitation they deserve.

At this difficult time in our history, please help the young heroes whose lives have been forever shattered as the search for peace continues. For them this is the "war after the war".

Enhanced security now part of life at Jewish institutions

By PABLO FUCHS
Special to CJN

The international climate since the start of the current intifadah and the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks has forced Jewish institutions across the city to review their security procedures.

Community centres, schools, and synagogues of all kinds have increased security over the past year to protect property and the lives of their many visitors.

Conditions in Israel and attacks against Jewish institutions in Europe have left them with no choice.

"We have to acknowledge that the world is a smaller place than ever before and that events in parts of the world that are very far away could have resonance here," said Len Rudner, director of community relations for Canadian Jewish Congress, Ontario region.

"We are very attentive to what's going on in Israel and Europe and we feel a necessity to properly protect our communal institutions."

Rudner, who advises synagogues, schools and community centres on security issues, has advised the leaders of these institutions to be vigilant, though he adds that there is not an environment of worry or fright in the Jewish community.

> There is not an environment of worry or fright in the Jewish community

"Community leaders are dealing with security issues very responsibly," he said. "They are dealing with lives, which are very precious, and with ways to augment security all the time."

The Aish HaTorah Learning Centre in Thornhill is among the many local institutions that have increased security in recent months, according to Alan Kleiman, its director of operations, finance and marketing. Since Sept. 11, the centre's staff has made sure the building is locked at all times and has added a video surveillance system to monitor each visitor.

"Our increased security is something we have to deal with, but we don't allow these concerns to impact any of our educational programming or our events," Kleiman said. "We have a big event planned with singer Amy Sky and we plan to continue to hold these events."

Miriam Telem, executive director of Beth David B'nai Israel Beth Am synagogue, echoed Kleiman's sentiments.

"Our main concern is to protect our people, not property," she said. "In the last two months, we've added security for the Saturday morning Shabbat service and it's clearly a result of international events. We want to provide comfort to all our members while they are here for whatever reason."

She added that having extra security has had its benefits, since many security guards have CPR training for medical emergencies.

Holy Blossom Temple has also been forced to re-evaluate its security procedures since Sept. 11.

"We've accepted the principle that if the door's open, there's got to be security there," said executive director Gary Posen. "This means that whenever we are open for business, there is a security presence in the building, at the door."

Since Holy Blossom houses a day school, a nursery school and night classes, the measures are essential, Posen said.

The synagogue also received a powder letter during the anthrax mail scare last October, he added.

"Things are very different than a few years ago, that's for sure. Our goal is to provide reassurance and a safe protective environment for everyone that visits the building. People are concerned, there's no doubt about it. They never complain that the security is there, they'll sometimes note that it's not tough enough."

Posen said the current mood is very difficult to measure. "Internationally, things can change in minutes or hours and can lead to things becoming quite uneasy locally. So we're taking things one day at a time, and for the time being, we can't go back to the status quo of a few years ago."

Meanwhile, the community is preparing for the High Holy Days, which come almost exactly one year after the terrorist attacks in New York and Washington.

Rudner's advice is to keep living life normally, but be aware of what can happen. "As the holidays approach, security preparations have become a part of normalcy," he said.

"Toronto is a well policed city and remains a safe place for Jews to live and work. Being cautious is part of being Jewish, but don't let that caution turn to fear and continue to live your life."

Looking in our spiritual mirror: have we changed since 9/11?

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

For Chashi Skobac, who teaches Jewish meditation in Toronto, last year's High Holy Day services resonated in a profound way in light of the Sept. 11 attacks on New York and Washington, D.C.

"The davening seemed to come alive. The words of the prayers seemed to be very relevant," she said recently, referring to portions about God's judgments regarding life and death.

"Here we were seeing it happening right before our very eyes, so they weren't words any more. They were very real."

Skobac, who began doing Jewish meditation in 1980 and who is married to Rabbi Michael Skobac, education director of Jews for Judaism, has a finely honed sense of her own spirituality within a Jewish context.

But for the wider community, it's only been in the last few years that the idea of Jewish meditation has gained even a modest foothold in some local mainstream congregations, reflecting a recent trend, particularly in the United States, to find new ways to infuse synagogue services with spirituality.

At Toronto's Beth Tzedec Congregation – the largest Conservative congregation in North America with approximately 3,000 families – Senior Rabbi Baruch Frydman-Kohl convened a meeting last year to explore ways of encouraging the use of meditation in services.

Although Leah Gitterman, 24, finds running spiritual, she says she also needs a Jewish outlet for her spirituality.

Although meditation and guided imagery have played a role in some Toronto healing services (which themselves reflect an increased yearning for spirituality) and in some learning services at Beth Tzedec, they have not been used in the formal sanctuary services, Rabbi Frydman-Kohl said.

A Saturday afternoon pre-service meditation program is in the works for this fall, to be run by Rabbi Aubrey Glazer, who was recently hired as Beth Tzedec's third rabbi.

"I think there is an interest in meditation in the community and how it can be done in a Jewish framework," said Rabbi Frydman-Kohl, although he doesn't attribute that sentiment to the events of Sept. 11 specifically.

"I think that the Sept. 11 crisis has generally made people more aware of their vulnerability. At the time, for a month following, we had included some special prayers and psalms in our daily liturgy, but we didn't continue that after the first month. Relative to some of the people in the New York and Washington areas, I didn't see the same significant upsurge of spiritual questing in the period after the September incidents. People were deeply and genuinely concerned... but I don't think it had the same kind of deep impact here."

Nonetheless he feels, as does virtually everyone who was interviewed for this article, that Sept. 11, combined with the violence and uncertainty of the situation in Israel, along with a fear of terrorism and anti-Semitism, have all had an effect on spiritual seekers.

"I think there's a continuing interest in growing as a Jew," said Rabbi Frydman-Kohl.

Mark Gilbert, 53, a psychiatrist who runs a mind-body medicine clinic, took part in the meeting with Rabbi Frydman-Kohl. Both personally and among his friends and patients, he noted a reawakening to the importance of spirituality after Sept. 11 – and a waning of that sentiment about five to six months later.

For Gilbert, Sept. 11 has prompted a stronger connection with his Jewishness through prayer and study, and in particular with Jewish moral principles, he said. He had already begun to strengthen his connection by attending synagogue regularly following his father's death three months earlier.

Jewish spirituality: People want to 'make sense of life'

"Spirituality is an attitude which gives meaning to one's life," Gilbert said. From a spiritual standpoint, "it's very important to come to the understanding that tragedy happens and yet we choose life and hope. Since Sept. 11, things have been put back in context."

Rabbi Mitch Mandel, director of outreach at Aish Thornhill, has seen concrete manifestations of a change in priorities among some of his congregants and the participants in Aish Hatorah's outreach program.

Five families among the 160 in his congregation were scheduled to make aliyah this summer, he noted as an example. Within the past two years, another 10 families have made the same move. "It's quite a chunk."

Also, before Sept. 11, Aish Hatorah's outreach programs commonly dealt with issues like Jewish holidays, parenting, marriage and balancing career and family. Those topics didn't fall by the wayside, he said, but after the attacks, people were more interested in "making sense of life."

What to tell their children about the attacks was a major concern, he said. Another was "what the Jewish people are all about.

"We had a lot of dialogue and certainly people struggling," often because their belief in Israel was at odds with their reluctance to go there, leading them to question the strength of their beliefs and wrestling with their own Jewish identity, Rabbi Mandel said.

Clearly there has been an increased interest in classes relating to spirituality, said Rabbi Jordan Cohen, associate director of Kolel: The Adult Centre for Liberal Jewish Learning. "This year we've been doing all kinds of them and they've all been well attended. We find there's a real hunger."

Rabbi Glazer, who explored different approaches to spiritual practice in a course he taught at Beth Tzedec called the Tao of Judaism, said he thinks a lot of people are turning to spirituality and spiritual practice as a coping mechanism to find meaning in the wake of catastrophe.

An increased interest in Kabbalah in recent years is particularly timely now, according to Rabbi Glazer.

He disagrees with the historic injunction against studying the mystical texts before the age of 40. "It would be a real mistake to shut off the taps of this wellspring.

"Kabbalah and specifically the Zohar [the central work in the literature of the Kabbalah] have a lot to teach us," said Rabbi Glazer. People from all kinds of backgrounds are asking questions about how to create meaning out of suffering and order out of chaos, he added. "There's so much more evil that we're aware of."

Leah Gitterman, 24, had less dramatic motivation last summer when she signed up for a course called Judaism and the Quest for Spirituality at Kolel: A Centre for Liberal Jewish Learning. In retrospect, she said, the course, which began in the fall, probably filled a need for a lot of people because of Sept. 11, but there wasn't much talk of the attacks during class time.

Gitterman, a clinical research assistant at Princess Margaret Hospital, had recently graduated from Dalhousie University, where she felt somewhat disconnected Jewishly because her experience there was so different from the family-oriented, large-community Judaism she was used to.

When she returned to Toronto and heard about the course, she thought, "Wow, that would be such an interesting way to look at Judaism."

Although the course focused on finding spirituality in Judaism and incorporating it into one's own life (rather than focusing on any terrorist attacks), Gitterman said that, "in times of uncertainty and change, I think it's even more important to be able to find those things in your life and incorporate them in a way that is comfortable to you. It's very consoling. As a result of the course, I'm taking a new look at Judaism and trying to make it more meaningful for me."

The course led her to become involved in the formation of Reviving Eden, a new Kolel-affiliated group for people in their 20s, which she chairs and which sponsored a spiritual retreat earlier this month.

Although Gitterman has become involved with like-minded young adults through Kolel, she also knows "tons of" her Jewish counterparts who have no interest in spirituality. Some of them have told her it's enough for them that they have lots of Jewish friends and that their family has Friday night dinner, she reports.

For Gitterman, her experiences over the past year have translated into an enthusiastic anticipation of Friday night dinner at her father's and taking time for herself over Shabbat.

In a secular context, she also finds running very spiritual, but, she said, "I do need something Jewish as well. It's part of who I am. I wouldn't feel as complete if I didn't incorporate Judaism into my life."

Left and right agree to disagree on Mideast situation

The debate among Israelis about their conflict with the Palestinians is mirrored by groups in our own community.. The CJN asked two organizations at opposite ends of the political spectrum for their views on the situation.

By ERIN SILVER
Special to The CJN

When it comes to making peace with the Palestinians, there isn't much doves and hawks can agree upon from their perches in Canadian-based organizations.

On the left, Canadian Friends of Peace Now advocates that Israel take an active role and make the first move to reach peace with the Palestinians. Since the intifadah began in September 2000, the group has been doggedly promoting a two-state solution to the present conflict.

"We think the way to make this happen is for Israel to take the initiative and withdraw from the West Bank and Gaza and dismantle the isolated settlements," says Sheldon Gordon, policy director for the Canadian branch of Peace Now, based in Toronto.

"This would show the Palestinians that Israel is committed to withdrawing and hopefully it would lead to the resumption of serious talks with the Palestinians," continues Gordon.

"It would also enable Israel to commit its military forces to self defence against terrorist incursions."

Though Larry Zeifman opposes being called a hawk, the co-chair of One Israel, the Canadian representatives of the YESHA Council, takes an opposing view to that espoused by Peace Now.

"We believe in the right of Jews to settle anywhere in Israel and we believe in their right to have the support of the Jewish community," he says, explaining that the YESHA Council is an elected body representing the Jewish communities of Judea and Samaria [West Bank] and Gaza.

He says the intifadah hasn't changed the organization's right-wing views. Rather, the bloody violence in the region has only reinforced them.

"We continue to hold the same views now as we did before the intifadah, but at the same time, the predicament of Jews has changed drastically," Zeifman says.

"The Jews in the West Bank in particular are on the front lines of the intifadah. They're subject to ongoing terrorist attacks and they're facing these threats on roads and in their communities. They're the most susceptible. These events have reinforced the need of Jews to provide them with protection and support."

Zeifman says the kind of support these West Bank communities require varies according to their specific needs.

"Some may need bullet-proof vests while other communities may require armoured vehicles, armoured ambulances and armoured buses to transport children to school," he says.

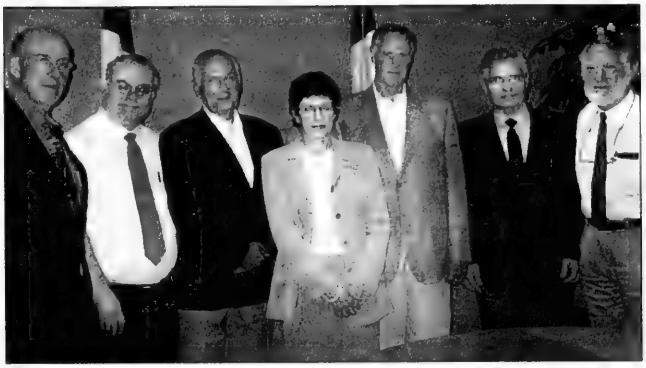
In short, the settlements shouldn't be disbanded.

"We're opposed to the dismantling of Jewish communities anywhere, including those in the West Bank," states Zeifman.

"Our focus in on their security needs."

Though One Israel doesn't take a stance on the peace process or on Israeli relations with the Palestinians and neighbouring Arab states, Peace Now certainly does.

For one, Peace Now doesn't support what it calls "political assassinations," referring to the targeted killing by Israel of suspected organizers of Palestinian terror attacks, nor does the group believe Israel has the right to determine the Palestinian leadership.



Peace Now delegation meets with Canada's foreign minister Bill Graham (third from right).

"We feel it's for the Palestinian people to decide through democratic elections who they'll be represented by," says Gordon.

"It's clear the Palestinians have different ideas as to who should represent them, but Israel has to make its decisions and policies based on who their leader is, not on who they'd like it to be."

In the mean time, the group is focusing its attention elsewhere – on what it calls the occupation.

"We're concerned that the [recent] re-occupation [by Israel of Palestinian-controlled areas] isn't going to accomplish what the Israeli government hoped it would," says Gordon.

"Suicide bombings are still continuing. We're of the view that a military solution isn't possible," he continues.

"We think a significant part of terrorism will subside if Israel left the occupied areas. The Palestinian people are behind the bombings because they feel it's the only way to drive Israel out of the territories. If Israel allowed the Palestinians to regain the West Bank and Gaza, they'd see it in their interest not to support terrorism."

But this doesn't mean Peace Now only advocates a land-for-peace solution.

"If there is going to be peace in the future, minds also have to change," says Gordon.

"We have to change what is taught to Palestinian students and what is broadcast to the people. We need peace at the elite level and acceptance and understanding of what peace implies in the Israeli and Palestinian populations."

Despite their obvious political differences, both groups do agree on one thing: peace isn't going to happen any time soon.

Violence in Israel causes emotional upheaval for Canadian parents, kids

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

Many parents are having difficulty dealing with the fact that their children want to go to Israel, despite the current violence there, says child and adolescent psychiatrist Sol Goldstein.

Some young patients are upset, but most say that life goes on, he said.

Although for reasons of privacy and confidentiality Goldstein would not discuss concerns of individual patients, he did comment on trends he has observed.

"It is parents who are worried about their children," he said. "Some stop them from going to Israel. In most cases, however, when children decide to go, parents are cautious, but supportive.

"Kids who have stronger families are allowed to go," he said.

Furthermore, where the parents' Zionism and interest in their religion dictate that the children should go, they allow it, he said.

"Parents who are less secure and more protective and can less tolerate the danger, will not allow it. These parents don't take into account that unless these children are offered a viable alternative, they are more likely to get themselves into difficulties here."

Children in their late teens often have idealistic and spiritual drives that if thwarted sometimes get them sidetracked into troublesome activities and behaviours, he explained.

Like Goldstein, psychiatrist Stanley Greben also spoke of general directions people are taking in facing the violence in Israel.

He said that people who are serious about Israel still go, but many hesitate in light of the current situation.

"Devoted people will go anyway. They want to be helpful; individually, they want to give support to Israel. Although they feel cautious about it, most go anyway.

"Some, however, defer it [the visit]. It is normal to react at least in part because of the known danger. For those in Canada, there is justifiable caution."

Holocaust survivors feel threatend by current events

Greben has been involved with the Trauma Centre of Herzog Hospital, Ezrath Nashim in Jerusalem, which treats patients with post-traumatic stress problems.

"Israelis have developed some skills in coping with the effects of traumatic events," he noted wryly.

But it is not only events in Israel that affect us here.

Greben noted that a patient in his practice who was a Holocaust survivor, and as a child spent six years in a concentration camp, said she felt threatened by the murder of David Rosenzweig last month.

"People who have been in any war, particularly the Holocaust, find it especially disturbing," he said.

He added that people who have family in Israel – children, grandchildren and their contemporaries, "for the most part, are in touch frequently and visit Israel."

'Mitzvah mission' visits victims of Palestinian terror

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

Nancy Weisbrod wanted to do something personally to help the Israeli victims of terrorist attacks and their families.

So the Toronto resident decided to form a group of unaffiliated people, independent of any organization, who would go to Israel on a "mitzvah mission" to visit the physically and emotionally wounded victims and their families.

She approached friend Sheila Hecker and within a short time, they were joined by fellow Torontonians Dorothy Pullan, Ed Pakes, Barbara Granek-Gutstein and Sara Zimmerman, as well as Deborah Rudolph of Los Angeles.

"We all wanted to do something along with giving money – though money is clearly what Israel needs," said Pullan of the group's trip to Israel May 19 to 28. "We were determined, so we went."

Even though four members of the group are trained to help people with psychological difficulties, therapy was not their goal. They went simply as caring individuals.

In their mission statement, the seven group members said their goal was bikur cholim, "the mitzvah of checking up on, visiting, or attending to the sick or wounded."

They also pledged to document their experiences with 25 victims and their families and share the stories with communities outside Israel.

Prior to leaving, they approached several Toronto Jewish day schools and asked students to create letters and cards that would be personally delivered to victims and their families.

In Israel, they conducted pre-arranged interviews and visits. They went in teams of two and they received permission to videotape, photograph and record the stories of terror victims and their families.

Among the Israeli victims they interviewed were Russian, French and Moroccan immigrants, as well as a non-Jewish Chinese labourer.

The group was assisted with translation by Rabbi Benjamin Friedberg, formerly of Toronto's Beth Tzedec Congregation, and James Casper, who also participated in the visits.

The interviews were arranged by One Family-Israel Emergency Solidarity Fund, an organization that focuses on responding to the needs of the individuals and families who have suffered from recent terrorist attacks.

Pakes called the trip "mission impossible, but we were committed to make it mission possible."

Pullan told The CJN that the group was totally unprepared for the blessings and words of kavod that they received. "We got much more out of our mission than we gave."

The Israelis told them that they wanted their stories to be heard by the rest of the world. "They want the world to know that they are the victims, not the terrorists," Pullan said.

The group also met with representatives from such Israeli organizations as Hadassah Hospital, Magen David Adom, Selah-Israel Crisis Management Center, Shaare Zedek Hospital Foundation, and the Israel Center for the Treatment of Psychotrauma, which is affiliated with Sarah Herzog Hospital (Ezrath Nashim).

Since their return, the participants have been invited to speak to several local groups and organizations. They are preparing a video and a presentation to encourage synagogues to help Israeli individuals and organizations who have been affected by terror.

For more information, call Pullan, 416-787-7613, or e-mail Weisbrod, nweisbrod@rogers.com.

Jews show support by 'buying Israel'

By JENNIFER PAQUETTE
Special to The CJN

Looking for Israeli products in your local store? If Sobey's supermarket in Thornhill is any indication, you may be disappointed to find empty shelves and gaps in free-standing product displays.

But don't worry. According to store manager Kevin Hopps, that's good news – it means Israeli products are more popular than ever here in Canada.

That growth can be credited to tremendous community support at a time when Israel is starting to feel the economic consequences of Sept. 11 and the intifadah.

Hopps says that "people want to support Israel – we recognize that people will be looking for these products."

To keep up with the increased demand, Hopps is adding new items to his shelves each week.

And to help his customers locate them, he has already created store displays that highlight Israeli products. He is also "looking at a couple of promotions" for the future, including implementing a "data strip" indicating products of Israeli origin, to appear alongside product prices on the shelves.

It's easier to import these products than ever before, thanks to the Canada-Israel Free Trade Agreement (CIFTA).

In 1998, Canada enacted CIFTA, which eliminated tariffs on virtually all manufactured goods. As well, 80 per cent of agricultural and agri-food products are duty-free or at a reduced tariff.

In the five years since its enactment, trade with Israel has more than doubled, and a bill was recently passed to further reduce or eliminate tariffs on almost all products moving both ways.

Largely as a result of CIFTA, two-way trade between Canada and Israel broke the $1-billion mark last year for the first time.

The only potential trade snag, Hopps says, is a federal requirement that goods be labelled in both official languages, but he says that is often waived for "specific ethnic products."

The growth in Canada-Israel trade has been met with enthusiasm by expatriate Israelis living here.

Rabbi Yisrael Landa, director of Toronto's Chabad Israeli Centre, also in Thornhill, says many have been galvanized by news reports of events in Israel.

"Coming from Israel, serving in the army, the news is different," he says. For most North Americans, news reports don't hit home in the same way, coming across just as words on a page.

"When an Israeli hears it, he sees it in front of his own eyes. Israelis feel Israel in a special way."

Rabbi Landa and the centre's volunteers have channelled that sentiment into a "Buy Israel" flyer campaign under way throughout the Greater Toronto Area. "As a community, we all felt that Israel needs the help of every Jew."

The slick flyers are bilingual, with Hebrew on one side and English on the other. In both languages, they urge shoppers to buy "kachol v'lavan" (blue and white, shorthand for Israeli goods), not only for the products themselves, but as a mitzvah.

> Growth in Canada-Israeli trade has been met with enthusiasm by expatriate Israelis living here

"By buying an Israeli cookie, you are buying a cookie and giving charity," Rabbi Landa explains.

With the country's current economic problems, caused by a lack of tourism and the mood of uncertainty, "you don't know whether two families in Israel are going to be out of jobs" if you buy a competing domestic brand.

For people looking for wedding or bar mitzvah gifts, Rabbi Landa suggests "visiting a Judaica store... which is full of things from Israel."

As an added bonus, he says, you will be able to choose something Jewish, which may make for a more meaningful gift.

But the exchange of goods between Israel and the Diaspora is just part of the story for Rabbi Landa; spiritual exchange is also a significant goal.

Following May's raid on terrorist encampments in Jenin, in which several Israeli soldiers lost their lives, the centre sponsored a Shabbat in Jerusalem for that unit, during which time they prayed and remembered their lost colleagues. The centre has also arranged to send a sefer Torah to Israel for the soldiers, and brought a soldier here to speak to the Canadian community.

"There is no end to what Israel needs," Rabbi Landa says.

And though there's no way to test the response to the flyer campaign, he is encouraged by the many calls to his office to say kol hakavod (well done) to his volunteers and staff – or from others offering assistance.

Meanwhile, on Sobey's shelves, community demand is clearly having an effect.

The store can't stock enough Israeli cheeses, yogurts and other milk products to keep up with the demand, and perhaps this is the best sign of all.

Rabbi Landa says Israeli dairy products are "very expensive," relative to similar domestic products (certain dairy, poultry and egg products have been excluded from CIFTA, at Canada's request, while some textiles are not covered, at Israel's request). But he says many Jews feel the price difference isn't important.

"They ask themselves, 'How can I leave [the store] without buying something from Israel?'"

So, from chocolate chips and coffee to fruit juices and pastries, buying Israeli doesn't have to mean sacrificing for the cause. It just means finding delicious new favourites – and perhaps performing a mitzvah in the process.

Help us prevent her breast cancer

More than a third of all Weizmann Institute research is aimed at conquering cancer. Our multi-discipline approach brings geneticists, cell biologists, immunologists and biophysicists in close collaboration with some ground-breaking results.

As well as work in the genetic origins of some cancers, today's research includes magnetic resonance spectroscopy for the early detection and treatment of breast cancer. The Weizmann Institute of Science in Israel needs more funds to generate yet more success and bring more hope to cancer sufferers.

A legacy to the Weizmann Institute will benefit humanity and can be directed to cancer research or any of its other research endeavours.

Teachers deal with fallout from intifadah and Sept. 11

By SIMONE JOSEPH
Special to The CJN

In Ilan Strauch's Grade 5 class last year, several children had strong emotional reactions to the intifadah against Israel.

"Some students were emotionally hurt, frustrated and angry after what had happened," said Strauch, a Jewish studies teacher at the Downtown Jewish Community School of Toronto.

After Sept 11 and the stepped-up campaign of suicide bombings in Israel, teachers and educators such as Strauch faced the daunting task of answering questions, dispelling misinformation and addressing fears.

For Strauch, a major challenge was responding to some of his students' desire for retribution.

"Some of the students had thoughts or ideas of revenge. They got us, let's get them. A big challenge is to teach that there are alternatives to violence."

Chava Bitterman, a Grade 5 teacher at Beth Tikvah Congregational School, also had students who desired revenge. Having heard much in the news about Osama Bin Laden, students said they wanted to choke or poison him for his alleged role in the events of Sept.11.

"I told them two wrongs don't make a right. It is better to get him and put him in prison and ask why he is doing these things so we can learn," said Bitterman.

Aside from voicing the standard questions, concerns or angry reactions after Sept. 11, some children also had negative physical responses.

More children have been anxious and have had trouble sleeping at night since Sept. 11, said Arlette Lefebvre, a child psychiatrist at the Hospital for Sick Children.

Recently, Lefebvre saw a 12-year-old boy who refused to get on a plane after Sept. 11 and has been sleeping in his parents' room.

Lefebvre also recalled the reaction of one 16-year-old girl to a scene in the movie True Lies when a jet crashes into a tall building. "She started shaking all over and had a panic attack," said Lefebvre.

Even young children have been affected by their experiences of hearing about and watching televised accounts of Sept. 11. The four-year-old son of one of Lefebvre's colleagues watched 20 minutes of news on Sept. 11. After seeing dust and debris falling on people, he became scared dust would fall on his toys and he began scrubbing them down.

After Sept. 11, Meir Balofsky's Grade 7 and 8 students were also scared. "There was a sense of fear, concern that the world had changed," said Balofsky, a teacher at USDS in Richmond Hill.

So, he held an open forum to explain to his students what had happened and to have them express their thoughts and reactions.

Balofsky then faced another challenge with the ongoing suicide bombings in Israel: preventing his students from seeing them as routine.

"They became virtually de-sensitized because [they were] so frequent," he said.

"As educators, you can only do so much to try to drive the message home to these students that you can't get dulled to this kind of violence... This was quite a challenge to myself and other educators."

Another difficulty was that his students did not understand the extent of the injuries in Israel. When they hear five people dead, 20 injured, they don't realize how serious the injuries are, Balofsky said. They would think "wounded" means scratches rather than paralysis or the loss of limbs.

Different schools and teachers had their own ways helping students cope with the events of Sept. 11 and the intifadah.

Teachers at the Downtown Jewish Community School were encouraged to talk to students about Sept. 11 and let children express their feelings, and to answer questions and reassure children that they are safe, said principal Joan Schoenfeld.

'The letters warmed our hearts'

"It was an opportunity to talk about heroes and the Jewish understanding of what a hero is," she said. "The concept that regular people do heroic things all the time".

After a suicide bombing at a seder in Netanya in March, students carried out their own small acts of heroism in response to a suggestion by the education department of the Jewish Agency for Israel.

They wrote personal thank-you letters to soldiers in an elite reserve infantry unit of the Israel Defence Forces. The letters arrived soon after two of the unit's soldiers had been killed and two injured.

"The letters warmed our hearts," said Yoav Gal, commander of company C, batallion 9 of the Jerusalem Brigade.

"You cannot imagine how important it was to know that somewhere on the other side of the globe, a group of young Jewish kids were thinking of us, worrying and feeling a belonging to Israel."

In addition to helping Israel – as students at the Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto (CHAT) did last year by raising $85,000 for an ambulance for Magen David Adom – it is vital for students to put the intifadah in a historical perspective, said Alex Gropper, a history teacher at CHAT's Tanenbaum campus in North York.

"The best weapon is to be informed and to have the facts at your fingertips," Gropper said.

To achieve this, the school's administration is considering introducing elements of the Arab-Israeli conflict in Grade 9 Jewish history classes, rather than in Grade 12 during the study of 19th and 20th century Jewish history.

"We want to make sure that our students have basic facts throughout their teenage years," said headmaster Paul Shaviv.

Another reason students need to be informed is because they may face pro-Palestinian propaganda at university, Gropper said.

"When they get to university, there are half-truths and misinformation," he said. "Our students, and the community at large, have to be able to answer certain charges that have been levelled."

During the last school year, CHAT held workshops, run by Jewish Campus Services in consultation with CHAT staff, that introduced students to tactics used by anti-Israel groups on university and college campuses and taught them how to deal with them.

Organizations combine to show support for Israel, deal with security

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

Julia Koschitsky

Local and provincial organizations have united to find ways to show support for Israel, as well as to deal with security issues that have arisen as a result of the violence there.

Ralph Shedletsky, the chair of the board of UJA Federation of Greater Toronto, says our community is mobilizing on Israel's behalf in unprecedented fashion.

"Over 18,000 community members have contributed more than $52 million to UJA Federation's Israel Emergency Campaign 2003, which began four months early this year so we could assist Israel as quickly as possible," he told The CJN.

Ed Morgan

The campaign will continue until the end of November, he says, "and when it's over, we'll be able to send millions of additional dollars to Israel to assist victims of terror, provide increased security for schoolchildren and help the vulnerable with medical and psychological support."

UJA's overseas partner, the Jewish Agency for Israel, has developed new support programs in the face of Israel's crisis, such as the Fund for Victims of Terror, to which UJA will allocate a significant portion of campaign funds, Shedletsky says.

Since the Palestinian wave of violence began at the end of September 2000, UJA Federation has organized monthly solidarity missions to Israel. Some 1,500 community members have participated. "Our fall/winter schedule is even more ambitious," he says.

Shedletsky spoke of another way the community is showing its support of Israel. A hundred Jewish community organizations have joined the Israel Now Consortium. Chaired by Julia Koschitzky, the consortium was formed last year as an initiative of the federation in response to what many in the community see as media bias and anti-Israel propaganda.

Ralph Shedletsky

"This has solidified our community's strong solidarity with Israel through vigils, rallies and educational initiatives," Shedletsky says.

Ed Morgan, chair of Canadian Jewish Congress, Ontario region, which is an integral part of the Israel Now Consortium, says that in addition to its participation in other events, in April, the Ontario region "was instrumental in getting 8,000 people to Ottawa for the largest national Jewish rally this country has seen."

Locally, he says, the Ontario region also works closely with smaller, grassroots organizations to help them organize rallies, vigils and media awareness programs.

"CJC Ontario region has become involved with several programs to educate people on the situation in Israel, directly or indirectly," Morgan says. For example, a trip is being planned for Ontario mayors to travel to Israel to observe the situation and to speak to their counterparts there.

"We also assist our national office in meeting with politicians, opinion makers and others on issues pertaining to Israel."

Congress' Ontario region has been mandated by the Jewish community to oversee security issues in the province, Morgan says. Congress representatives meet regularly with the OPP, the RCMP, CSIS and local police services throughout the province "to discuss issues concerning security and to ensure the highest level of defence for our community."

"We have sharpened our security concerns," Shedletsky adds, referring to UJA's partnership with Canadian Jewish Congress on security issues as a result of Sept. 11, terrorism in the Middle East and anti-Semitic incidents in Europe, in North America and locally.

"I think that many members of our community are more worried about security today than they were at this time last year, while recognizing, at the same time, that Toronto and Canada provide a strong level of comfort for Jewish life."

Post-Sept. 11 terror fears keep police busy

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

We in the West need to realize that people from other cultures do not necessarily think like us, says Norm Gardner, chair of the Toronto Police Services Board.

"Too often, we base our viewpoints on our own ethics and morality, rather than on the way people in other cultures look at situations" said Gardner, a former North York, Metro and Toronto city councillor who has been chair of the police services board since 1998.

"Before Sept. 11, who would have thought that anyone would fly a plane into a tower?

"The terrorists showed us that they are ready to sacrifice their lives to carry out their objectives. It seems that martyrdom is something that we in the West have to face when dealing with threats," he said from his office at Toronto Police headquarters on College Street.

Norm Gardner

Our upbringing has made Canadian society more open than others, he said. "We have freedom of speech and the availability of the mass media.

"[The terrorists] have been raised in a dictatorship. Their educational system has brainwashed them, and they do not want to play by our rules."

People have been caught in Toronto who are in the country illegally, said Gardner, but he is not aware of anyone carrying out overt terrorist activities in the city.

"Generally speaking, we are safe here, but anyone in a free and open society is subject to being undermined by people who will go to extremes to carry out violence."

'We have to harden our defences,' board chair Norm Gardner says

Since September, he said, his office has been inundated with requests for background checks from, mostly American, law enforcement agencies.

"We've had to spend at least $1 million in overtime because they had to be done quickly. These checks are on people whose names have come up, or on people who have raised suspicion in any way.

"We've had to take experienced investigators off other assignments in order to tend to our priorities, and it takes a lot of investigative time to determine if there is a level of danger. Police cannot afford not to take everything seriously."

People and organizations can try to protect themselves from possible terrorist attacks, he said, by making it difficult to be made a victim.

"There should be security at community centres, synagogues and schools. We have to harden our defences and make it difficult for anyone to take action with the expectation of getting away with it."

Both Jewish and Muslim organizations have received increased police protection, but it is up to individual organizations to work out their own security systems, which can be done in consultation with police, Gardner said.

"We can't know for sure if something is going to happen" he said, "but the big thing is to liaise with other law enforcement agencies, feed each other information, and make assessments.

"Obviously, whoever is going to carry out a threat will not tell us ahead of time, but it is essential for [certain things] to be evaluated on a constant basis. Even minor incidents have to be investigated as thoroughly as possible," he said.

Gardner said he has been lobbying the federal government to transfer money to municipal police forces in order to enhance intelligence gathering. "We are handicapped. We cannot undertake expensive intelligent gathering without federal money, but they won't even grant us an audience.

"I've been trying to set up a meeting, but I feel I am getting the run-around.

"Cities such as Toronto, Montreal and Vancouver, and their surrounding areas, are big nesting grounds for potential terrorists and their supporters. The municipal forces can definitely use some added funding," he said.

As for a possibility of peace in the Middle East, Gardner said that he has come to the conclusion that some Arab countries cannot afford peace.

"Some countries have huge unemployment and social problems, and they are pleased to make Israel the diversion in order to stop Arab citizens from demonstrating [against regimes in their own countries].

"There are a lot of people who feel there is no future in these countries, so they move towards radical extremism and start getting involved in martyrdom. It is not healthy for these countries not to deal with their social issues."

When Arab countries stop looking for someone else to blame for their social problems, things will be a lot better for a lot of people, said Gardner.

Calling for Strength. Calling to Care.

From September 9-12, between Rosh Hashana and Yom Kippur, UJA Federation telethon volunteers will be calling more than 7,000 donors whom we have not yet reached for the Israel Emergency Campaign 2003. Our New Year Israel Emergency Telethons are taking place at an especially caring time of year, when we consider how to best help the people of Israel suffering from two years of terror.

Your UJA Federation gift increase will be sent directly to Israel to

- Assist victims of terror and their families
- Expand security for Israel's school children
- Provide human services plus medical and psychological support for Israel's vulnerable who are most affected by the current crisis.

Begin the New Year by demonstrating your deep personal commitment to Israel and the strength of our remarkable community. Because we are truly stronger together.

To volunteer for one of the following telethon shifts at the Lipa Green Building, 4600 Bathurst St., please call Donna at 416.635.2883 ext. 320.

- Monday, September 9 – 6:00-9:00 p.m.
- Tuesday, September 10 – 12:30-3:30 p.m., 6:00-9:00 p.m.
- Wednesday, September 11 – 6:00-9:00 p.m.
- Thursday, September 12 – 6:00-9:00 p.m.
